THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE FEDERAL AND REGIONAL STATES’ CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW SYSTEM IN ETHIOPIA: THE CASE OF OROMIA REGIONAL STATE

Muluken Kassahun*

ABSTRACT

Ethiopia follows non-judicial model of constitutional review system, which empowers the House of Federation (HoF) and the Council of Constitutional Inquiry (federal CCI) at federal level. At Oromia level, the Constitutional Interpretation Commission (CIC) and the Regional Council of Constitutional Inquiry (regional CCI) are the organs entrusted with the task of constitutional reviewing. This article has examined the vertical relation between these federal and regional\(^1\) constitutional review systems. The study reveals that there are no specific rules or mechanisms that govern the impact of diversity of constitutional recognition of rights between the federal government and the regional state. Moreover, there is no system to resolve or demarcate jurisdictional overlap of constitutional claims that may arise on laws, over decisions and on cases decided by cassation over cassation. Consequently, the HoF has monopolized all constitutionality claims by devouring the power and functions of the regional constitutional review organs.

Key Words: Constitutional review, FDRE Constitution, Revised Oromia Constitution (ROC), House of Federation (HoF), Constitutional Interpretation Commission (CIC), and Council of Constitutional Inquiry (CCI).

\(^1\) Central government and Constituent units are known by different names in federal countries. Many federations refer to central government as the ‘federal government’ including Ethiopia, While in India (Union Government), Spain (State), South Africa (National government), and in Australia designated as a Commonwealth government. Similarly, the term ‘states’ commonly used in Australia, Brazil, Ethiopia, India, Malaysia, Mexico, Nigeria, and the USA. The term ‘province’ preferred in Argentina, Canada, Pakistan and South Africa. Other terms ‘Lander’ in Germany and ‘Canton’ in Switzerland employed. (See George Anderson, Federalism: An Introduction, Oxford University Press, 2008, Pp.2-3). In this paper, the terms ‘central’ and ‘federal’ are used to refer to the central government and the terms ‘regional’, ‘state’, and ‘sub-national government’ are interchangeably used to refer the Ethiopian Constituent units.
1. INTRODUCTION

Ethiopia adopted Ethnic/Multinational federalism, at least de jure, since the 1995 Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopia (FDRE) Constitution. At federal level, the constitution empowers the House of Federation (hereafter HoF) to entertain constitutional disputes while it is silent on how to interpret state constitutions. Due to such constitutional space, among nine regional states of the country, the Southern Nations, Nationalities and Peoples (SNNP) authorizes the Council of Nationalities and the remaining eight states entrusted the function to the organ called Council of Constitutional Inquiry (hereafter CIC).\(^2\) Moreover, the regional states have adopted a diversified approach to select the members of this organ. However, in almost all states, the composition of members, expressly or impliedly involves the two-fold formula of ethnic identity and political affiliation. The Constitutional Interpretation Commission (hereafter CCI) is separately established to serve as an advisory body of these constitutional adjudicating organs.

The Revised Oromia Constitution (hereafter ROC), in force, assigns the task to the regional CIC and CCI. These organs have started operation in 2014 after nearly two decades of its recognition in the regional constitution.\(^3\)

The Federal and regional constitutional review organs are empowered to perform their function independent of one another. In doing so, governing the relationship between the central and state constitutional review is vital, among other things, to balance the independent interpretation of state constitutions (self-rule) and federal unity values (shared rule), and to avoid overlap of jurisdiction that may occur between the federal and regional constitutional reviews.\(^4\) Furthermore, because of a substantial number of cases that were brought to the Federal CCI arise from Oromia, it's decisive to deal their linkage. In spite of this, there is no law which governs the relationship between central and sub-national constitutional reviews. In effect, currently, the federal constitutional adjudicating organs admit and render decisions on the cases, which is more appropriate to be entertained by regional constitutional adjudication organs. This act demises the power and function of Oromia constitutional review organs that are empowered by the ROC.

Hence, this article intends to examine the relationship between the federal and state constitutional reviews in Ethiopia with particular emphasis on the Oromia constitutional review system. To this effect, the writer have conducted interview with concerned federal and regional officials and analyzed the recently decided cases in addition to examining primary and secondary sources. In this regard, the scope of the study does not extend to considering administrative relations and investigating the standards for the success of constitutional reviews such as independence, impartiality, and competence of the organ and its members. Instead of that, the paper focuses on identifying how these organs entertain the constitutionality claims that are brought before them particularly on issues tied with human rights.

The article, in addition to introducing both tier constitutional review system, answers the following questions: How the Oromia regional state interpret the regional diversified constitutional rights within the FDRE Constitution frameworks? To what extent the regions have autonomy, from federal constitutional interpretation, to interpret the regional constitutional rights? Oromia regional state in interpreting its own constitution what possible conflict of interest over jurisdiction of entertaining constitutionality issue may arise with federal constitutional review? What is its impact and how could we resolve the problem? To what extent both tier constitutional review organs cooperate and control one another in exercising their respective powers and functions?

5 For instance, from April 20/2015- March 17/2016, 265 cases were brought to Federal CCI from all regions, including Addis Ababa and Dire Dawa cities. From all cases, 52 (nearly 20%) of them arises from Oromia region (Interview with Ms. Gebeyanesh Abebe, Federal CCI Registrar Officer, Addis Ababa, March 17, 2016).
With the view to address the above raised questions the paper is organized into six sections. Following this introductory section, section two reviews the current federal and Oromia constitutional reviews with the view to present their legal and institutional frameworks with their common features. It also highlights the general guiding rules that can regulate the relationship between each tier review system. Section three briefly examines the relationship between the federal and regional constitutions in interpreting the diversified human rights incorporated in each constitution. This helps us to understand the upshot of convergent and divergent rights on interpreting chapter three of both constitutions. Section four demonstrates the possible grounds of jurisdictional overlap and ways of fixing the problem in order to overcome the problem of forum shopping and duplication of efforts. Then after, the scope of mutual responsibility between the two review systems will be examined in section five. This section aims at showing the demarcation between the federal comity and the level of integration as well as vertical check and balance among each review systems. Finally, section six concludes the article.

2. BRIEF OVERVIEW OF THE FDRE AND OROMIA REGIONAL STATE CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW SYSTEM

According to Hans Kelsen, a constitution without constitutional review is just like not having a constitution at all since the constitutional adjudication system is an institutional safeguard for constitutionalism.\(^6\) That is why adopting constitutional review system is proliferated at alarming rate since World War II. Toms Gins Burg and Mila Versteeg reveal that from 1787 of first USA constitution up to 1951, some 38% of all constitutional systems had a constitutional review, whereas, by 2011, this percentage increased to 83% out of 204 countries.\(^7\) However, the existence of a constitutional review system alone is not sufficient to guarantee for constitutionalism.

In countries having federal and state constitutions, some nation’s constituent units constitutions are interpreted by the federal government (e.g. by the Federal High court in Switzerland). In Ethiopia, HoF is the final constitutional interpreting body of the federal government. The HoF is structurally upper legislative house and functionally performs acts other than lawmaking. This body comprises the representatives of the nations, nationalities, and peoples of Ethiopia, which the FDRE Constitution empowers them as the source of sovereign power in the country. Currently, the House composes 153 members that weightily represent 76 ethnic groups. Each member, legally speaking, shall be selected by State Council or directly elected by people. In addition to this, the federal CCI, advisory 11 According to Art. 61(2) of the FDRE Constitution, each nations, nationalities, and peoples shall be represented in the House of Federation by at least one member. Each Nation and Nationality shall be represented by one additional representative for each one million of its population. The current ethnic representation in the HoF looks as follow:

i. From Oromia Region Oromo represented by 31 members, ii. From Amhara Region, among 29 representatives that represent six ethnic groups of the region, the representation scheme shows Amhara (24), Argoba (1), Waghimra (1), Hawi (1), Kimant (1) and Oromo (1) representatives, iii. From Tigray Region among 8 representatives from the region, three ethnic group represented as Tigre (6), Erob (1) and Kunama (1), iv. From Afar Region, Afar ethnic group represented by two (2) members,

v. From Somale Region, Somali Ethnic group represented by 6 persons, vi. From SNNP among 67 representatives that represent 55 ethnic groups of the region Sidama (4), Gurge (3), Walaya (3), Kaficho (2), Silte (2), Hadiya (2), Gamo (2), Gedeo (2) and the remaining ethnic groups independently represented by 1 members in the HoF.

vii. From Benishangul Gumuz Region, five indigenous ethnic groups (Berta, Gumuz, Shinasha, Mao, and Komo) represented by one member, separately.

viii. From Gambella, four indigenous ethnic groups of the region (Majanger (1), Anyuak (1), Nuer (1) and Upo (1)) represented totally by four members in the HoF and

ix. From Harari Region, Harari ethnic group represented by one member. (Interview with Ato Woldu Merineh, Constitutional Interpretation and Rights Affairs Directorate Director, House of Federation, Addis Ababa, January 27, 2016);

This data implies among 76 ethnic groups represented in the HoF only 14 (Fourteen) have more than one million population, which constitute about 18.4 % of total ethnic groups. These 14 ethnic groups occupy more than 2/3rd of HoF seats whereas the remaining 62 ethnic groups (81.6%) have below one million populations separate occupy less than 1/3rd of the house seats.

12 Here, the FDRE Constitution doesn't distinguish the circumstances of State Council selects members of HoF or selection through conducting direct election. Though, the FDRE body of HoF, comprises eleven members selected from the judiciary, HoF and those selected by parliament and executive. The details of the establishment, organization, power, and function of HoF and CCI is provided in Proclamations No. 251/2001 and, No. 798/2013 respectively.

The 2001 ROC entrusts the function of constitutional adjudication to CIC and its advisory body, regional CCI. The establishment laws of the CIC and CCI enacted by Caffee are Proc. No. 167/2011 and 168/2011, respectively. The CIC has been mandated to resolve any constitutional dispute that arise in Oromia laws and has the duty to ensure regional constitutional supremacy. The body comprises of representatives nominated based on the principle of territoriality from each District Council. Each district, including Urban Councils, is represented by one member. Thus, the CIC has composed 265 rural district and 44 Urban Council representatives.

The Oromia CCI, advisory body of CIC has mandated to investigate the existence of a constitutional dispute and submit its recommendation to CIC for a final decision. The organ comprises 11 members; President and Vice President of Oromia Supreme Court, respectively who serve as Chairperson and Vice Chairperson of CCI. Six lawyers are also appointed by Caffee up Accordingly “direct election conducted where disagreement happen between members of State Council having more than one NNP, on who shall represent and who will be represented in the HoF” (Translation mine). The contrario reading of this statement implies that State Councils which represent only one ethnic group to HoF such as in case of Oromia and Somale, even if disagreement arises on representation, they can’t resolve by direct election. But, this statement was not provided in the FDRE Constitution. (Constitutional Explanatory note, Unpublished, P.116 (Retrieved from http://www.abyssinialaw.com/constitutions#, last accessed on March 19, 2016). Practically, direct election has never been conducted.

Accordingly, the President and Vice President of the Federal Supreme Court, serve as Chairperson, and Vice Chairperson of CCI, respectively. Six lawyers appointed by President of Republic up on the recommendation of House of Peoples’ Representatives on the basis of their professional excellence, three persons designated by HoF from its members (See FDRE Constitution, Art. 82).

on the recommendation of the Regional President and three other persons are designated by the Caffee\(^{17}\) presented by the speaker of Caffee for approval.\(^{18}\)

Generally, both at federal and Oromia state tier, the winners of each election, periodically make up their own constitutional adjudicator. For this reason, local government electorates of each Woreda/U rban Council selects the Oromia CIC members, and the Caffee, regionally, selects Oromia CCI members and the representatives of Oromo nation to HoF. The ROC and FDRE Constitution used the term ‘constitutional interpretation’ and ‘constitutional dispute’ interchangeably. At both tiers, each organ is empowered to entertain the cases of abstract and concrete review\(^{19}\), political and non-political questions\(^{20}\) and constitutional complaints\(^{21}\) through posteriori review system. Though, unlike Oromia CIC and CCI, the HoF is further authorized to give advisory opinion, consensually.\(^{22}\)

In Ethiopia, there is no law which specifically regulates the relationship between the federal and regional constitutional review systems even if such

\(^{17}\) The English Version of the ROC Art. 68(2c) doesn’t require designation from Caffee members, whereas the Afan Oromo version (the final legal authority as per Art. 113 of ROC) require membership of Caffee for such designation.

\(^{18}\) Accordingly, the Oromia CCI composes the first two members from the judiciary, the appointment of those six legal experts involves the role of executive and legislative and the last three members represented from legislature itself. Though, unlike Federal CCI, all Oromia CCI members are directly or indirectly selected by Caffee. In case of final approval of 11 Federal CCI members, it involves at least three bodies (Parliament, President, and HoF). Also, in Oromia both legally and practically, there are no different procedures to be followed during the appointment and designation by Caffee (See Minute of Caffee meeting, 4\(^{th}\) term, 1\(^{st}\) year, 4\(^{th}\) regular session, unpublished, 2011, P. 39).

\(^{19}\) The abstract review is a kind of review not incidental to cases, while the concrete review is an instant of an event of the case. The earlier is recognized in Oromia CCI Procl. No. 168/2011 of Art. 22 (4) as it says; “A case requiring constitutional interpretation which may not be handled by courts may be submitted to the CCI by, at least, 1/3rd of the members of Caffee or regional executive bodies. Also, Art. 3(2C) of the Federal CCI proclamation states “constitutional interpretation on any unjusticiable matter may be submitted to the Council by one-third or more members of the federal or State Councils or by federal or state executive organs”. Accordingly, Abstract review serves for non justiciable matters, for cases not handled by courts. Besides, the concrete review is constitutionally guaranteed in Art. 69(2) of the ROC and Art. 84(2) of the FDRE Constitution.

law is crucial to maintain the shared rule and self-rule principles of federalism, to celebrate the diversified guarantees of fundamental human rights and to overcome the possibilities of overlap of jurisdictions. Yet, there are some scattered general provisions in the FDRE Constitution that can possibly guide such relationships. For instance, the preamble swear for building one political and economic community,²³ supremacy of federal constitution (Art. 9), principle of federal comity (Art. 50/8), government duty towards fundamental human rights and freedoms of chapter three (Art.13)²⁴ and consistency clause (Art. 50/5) that mandate the central and regional governments conform with these provisions in performing their tasks. In the broadest sense, these clauses can also serve as guiding principles in dealing the linkage of federal and regional states constitutional review system in Ethiopia.

3. THE DIVERSITY OF RECOGNITION OF RIGHTS UNDER THE ROC AND FDRE CONSTITUTIONS AND ITS IMPACT ON INTERPRETING CONSTITUTION

The issue of fundamental human rights and freedoms are one of the core areas that could arise in the relationship between the federal and states constitutional review systems. The sub-national recognition of a diversity of rights as a symbol of constitutional autonomy can either be similar to or lesser or better protection than the federal constitution. This helps us to comprehend the extent of exercising autonomy in interpreting the regional states diversified constitutional rights within the FDRE Constitution frameworks or balancing self-rule (diversity) and shared rules (unity) values.

²³According to Dr. Assefa, the notion interrelated with the protection of minorities in the constituent units in a manner that strikes proper balance between the nationalities right to self-rule and the free movement of labor and capital as a matter of necessity (See Assefa Fisseha, Federalism and Accommodation of Diversity in Ethiopia: A Comparative Study, (3rd ed., Nijmegen: Wolf Legal Publisher (ELP), 2010).P.384.

²⁴This provision states that ‘all Federal and State organs’ shall have the responsibility and duty to respect and enforce the fundamental human rights provisions of Chapter three. Those rights, also, shall be interpreted in a manner conforming to the principles of the international human rights instruments adopted by Ethiopia.
This conception is deeply rooted in the understanding of state constitutionalism as an intrinsic element of federalism.\textsuperscript{25}

\subsection*{3.1. IDENTICAL OR SIMILAR OR CONVERGENT PROVISIONS}

In Ethiopia, adopting the provisions that are similar to federal constitutional rights is a simple choice of states autonomy rather than ordered by the FDRE Constitution. Many of the ROC fundamental human rights and freedoms of chapter three provisions are the reproduction of chapter three of the FDRE Constitution. In relation to the interpretation of those similar rights, there is no clear legal rule developed. In other federations, such as in Switzerland, when cantonal provisions do not expand beyond federal guarantees, they have no independent impact, but in USA and Germany, both have an autonomous impact and can be interpreted independently.\textsuperscript{26} Although in those countries the supremacy clause applies only in case of a conflict between two rights provisions.

In our country, arguably, pursuant to Art. 13 (1 and 2) of the FDRE Constitution, both federal and states are required to interpret human rights provisions of Chapter three of the constitution to conform to the principles of international human rights (\textit{hereafter, IHR}) instruments adopted by Ethiopia. Accordingly, the constitution does not order states to follow the decision of federal precedent rather they have a responsibility to follow IHR standard. This implies there is a parallel relation between state and federal constitutional review in relation to chapter three of both tiers constitution.

\subsection*{3.2. STATE PROVISIONS LESS PROTECTIVE OR RESTRICTIVE THAN THE FDRE CONSTITUTION}

Restrictive protection of rights in state constitution occurs either of when state constitution protects the same rights as the federal constitution but restricts the scope of the protection offered, insert broader restriction or when

\begin{footnotesize}
\begin{itemize}
\end{itemize}
\end{footnotesize}
they ignore certain rights protected by the federal constitution. In USA, states should not go below federal constitution as Art. VI (2) of the USA Constitution declares as the supreme law of the land. Similarly, under Art. 49 of the Swiss Constitution, state constitutions can only guarantee protections that are at least equal to the federal constitutional requirements.

The FDRE Constitution recognizes the supremacy of federal constitution under Art. 9 and Art. 50 (5) require State Councils to adopt and amend state constitution consistent with the FDRE Constitution. This means if states adopt laws inconsistent or recognize rights below FDRE Constitution their effect will be null and void. But, in practice, the regional states including Oromia have incorporated conditions on some federally guaranteed rights. For instance, according to article 39 of the ROC, the right to secession is made conditional which the federal constitution makes it unconditional. Some argue this is a clear violation of the federal constitution as it limits the rights guaranteed under the federal constitution while others argue that this conclusion works only in the case of regions which the right to self-determination is given to more than one ethnic groups (Divided Sovereignty).

3.3. BETTER PROTECTION OF RIGHTS IN STATES CONSTITUTION

States can protect rights in a better way through broadening the scope of state constitutional rights or limit the restrictions that can be imposed on federal rights to stricter conditions. The regional states constitution protection of rights beyond the national minimum constitutional guarantees is an important area for sub-national constitutional textual innovation and evolution, which makes states to serve as a laboratory of democracy and a place of evolution of constitutional rights. For example, in the USA, various 28 Id., Pp.310-311.

29 According to Art. 39(4) of ROC, the right to secession is exercised when the right of internal self-determinations provided in Art.39(1-3) are suspended or encroached up on and when such cannot be remedied under auspices of the union with other peoples. This condition was not provided under Art. 39 of the FDRE Constitution.
31 Celin, Supra note 26, P.311.
states have recognized privacy and socio-economic rights & in Mexico, Oaxaca state constitution has provided rights for indigenous peoples that do not appear in their federal constitutions.\(^\text{32}\)

Similarly, Art. 32 of the ROC has broadened the scope and list of the components of freedom of movement\(^\text{33}\) and the lists of non-derogable rights in the ROC\(^\text{34}\) are wider in coverage than those provided in the FDRE Constitution. States are at liberty to interpret those rights in a better way. Yet, the Oromia CIC proclamation, Art.19 (3), and CCI statute Art. 18 (2) is problematic on the issue.\(^\text{35}\) Both laws mandate each body to follow the interpretation of IHR instruments and HoF decision, not only on convergent rights but also on divergent ones. At this point, if interpretation of both documents is similar particularly on identical rights it's not as such problematic, whereas if both interpretations conflict each other, both laws are silent on which one should prevail.

However, both Art. 13(2) of the FDRE Constitution and ROC provide interpretation of chapter three should be in a way that conforms to IHR standards adopted by the country. This implies states are not mandated to follow federal precedent, rather ordered to meet the IHR standard. Also, non-inclusion of the term ‘conform to HoF decision’ can’t prevent to consider the \(^{33}\) Accordingly, Art. 32 of the FDRE Constitution guarantees the right to liberty of movement, freedom to choose residence, the freedom to leave and return to the country, whereas Art. 32 of the ROC further recognize the right to work, possess and own property in the region.

\(^{34}\) The FDRE Constitution makes the prohibition against inhuman treatment (art. 18), equality before law (art. 25) and the right to self-determination (Art. 39 (1 and 2) as non-derogable rights, while Art. 108(4) of the ROC, in addition to above rights further extends non derogability of rights to right to life (Art. 15), right to security of person (Art. 16), the right to respect human dignity of detained or imprisoned person (Art. 21(1)), the right to recognition of status of person ( Art. 24(1)), and freedom of thought, conscience and religion (Art.27(1)).

later, as the federal standard is a minimum guarantee to protect rights in regional states.

4. JURISDICTIONAL OVERLAP BETWEEN OROMIA AND FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL ADJUDICATORS

4.1. GROUNDS FOR POSSIBILITIES OF JURISDICTIONAL OVERLAP

The dual system of constitutional control could cause the problem of jurisdictional overlap over its adjudication due to a number of resemblances exhibited in the contents of both constitutions, especially chapter three of federal and Oromia Constitution.\(^{36}\) This could possibly happen on laws and decisions as well as due to judicial practice of cassation over cassation.

4.1.1. Overlap on Laws

The jurisdictional overlap over laws could happen when the same state laws have the possibility to be entertained by both tiers of constitutional adjudicators. For instance, if a law enacted by is inconsistent with the ROC, the case should be brought before the regional CCI and CIC. This may happen when the subject matter is purely regional matter disputed with regional constitution. However, if any law enacted by the regional legislature infringes federal constitution, the case will be brought before the Federal CCI. Because, Art. 84(2) of the FDRE Constitution empowers the federal CCI to review the constitutionality of any law enacted by State Council irrespective of whether it involves both pure state matter or federal issue. Moreover, there is a possibility when a law enacted by Caffee contravenes with the FDRE and ROC simultaneously. It is not clear to which body the case should be brought when these jurisdictional overlaps happen.

Correspondingly, unlike the FDRE Constitution, the ROC expressly empowered CCI and CIC to entertain the subordinate legislations enacted by executives when it is contested unconstitutional with the regional constitution as per Art. 69(2) of the ROC. However, it is silent towards who resolves if the regional regulation or directive contrast with the FDRE Constitution. Moreover, the FDRE Constitution has nothing to say on who should be engaged to resolve where state/federal subordinate legislations contravene with the federal constitution. In effect, at federal level, there are squabbles among scholars on the appropriate organ to entertain the constitutionality of subordinate laws of federal and regional governments. However, irrespective of whether the constitutionality of subordinate legislations entertained by regular courts or federal CCI/HoF, it can’t prevent the possibility of the occurrence of overlap of jurisdiction between the federal and states.

4.1.2. Overlap on Disposing Constitutionality of Decisions

The federal and state constitutional adjudicators review the constitutionality of decisions given by organs of government or public officials or acts of customary practices. At this juncture, constitutionality issue arises not with the law, rather with the act or decision of a government body or officials. Such decision could have the possibility of violating both tiers constitution simultaneously. For instance, in the case between Alima Mahamad vs Adem Abdi on the issue of possession of the rural land, the federal CCI rules decision of the Oromia Supreme Court Cassation Bench and Federal Supreme Court Cassation Bench infringes Art. 40(3) and 40(4) of the FDRE Constitution and 37 Accordingly, several scholars argue regular courts have the power to review the constitutionality of laws issued by federal and regional executive bodies based on Art. 84(2), 13(1) and 79 of the FDRE Constitution. For instance, Assefa Fisseha and Menberetsehai Tadesse argued courts are empowered by the FDRE constitution to interpret laws other than federal and state proclamations. Similarly, Ibrahim Idris concludes the constitutionality of any administrative acts/decisions is within the jurisdiction of ordinary courts. Tsegaye Regassa, also, propagates courts have inherent power to review the constitutionality claim of laws that contradicts with the constitution. Other scholars expressly or impliedly propagate the centralized approach which the HoF/federal CCI are the sole institutions to resolve constitutionality disputes of any laws including regulations and directives based on cumulative reading of Art. 83(1) and 84. For instance Yonatan Fisseha states the courts have the power only to apply constitution and if constitutionality issue arises their role is limited to referral. Girmachew Alemu also notes courts are denied the power to interpret the constitution. Getachew Assefa moreover concludes all constitutional disputes involving federal and state proclamation, regulation, directive and decisions of federal and state organ within constitutional interpretation is the power of HoF/ Federal CCI.

38 See Art. 9(1) and 62(1) of the FDRE Constitution and Art. 9(1) and Art. 67(1) of the ROC
This implies the existence of the possibility of jurisdictional overlap on the issue.

Also, in the cases between Mamite Seble vs Mulu Gurmu (possession of rural farmland)\(^{40}\), Aliy Dawe vs Mahamad Adem (sale of land)\(^{41}\), and Wedere Tachbele vs Likke Gurmu (possession of farmland and property claims)\(^{42}\), HoF quashed the decisions of courts based on the FDRE Constitution. The above cases can also have the possibility to be claimed before the Oromia CCI and CIC since the original claims were entertained by Oromia courts, based on regional laws. Besides, the governing proclamation of both state and federal constitutional review doesn’t provide the exhaustion of local remedy by one another, except identity claims.\(^{43}\) In such case, the claimant can bring his/her case to either of both institutions.

4.1.3. Judicial Practice (Constitutionality issue in Cassation over Cassation Cases)

The current judicial practice of cassation over cassation by the Federal Supreme Court in Ethiopia, in turn, became one of the contentious issues, on its compatibility with the overall federal system and its constitutionality.\(^{44}\) This sub-section focuses on addressing the implication of cassation over cassation on the jurisdictional overlap of constitutional review.

43 A Proclamation to Consolidate the House of the Federation and the Definition of Its Power and Responsibilities, Procl. No. 251/2001, Arts. 19(1) and 20.

The writer observes two kinds of arguments related to the Oromia and federal constitutional adjudicator officials. Some officials argue that the case should be brought before the Federal CCI as the case once decided by federal organ, state organs and officials have no legal and moral capacity to review or reverse the federal organ (Supreme Court) decision. While others argue, both institutions can review the case based on the claimant's constitutional basis. Accordingly, if a person bases his claim on the ROC, it should be brought before Oromia CCI and if the claimant’s constitutional claim base is the FDRE Constitution, such case can be entertained by the Federal CCI. This argument, however, come up with the problem of forum shopping in entertaining constitutionality issue.

The current practice shows that the Federal CCI and HoF accept and decide on cases decided by Federal Supreme court Cassation Bench through cassation over cassation on state matters. The federal CCI, admit each case only by considering whether the issue involves the FDRE constitutional matter, rather than deciding on whether the jurisdiction of the case is appropriate for federal or state. This limits the Oromia CIC and CCI autonomy to exercise their powers entrusted by the ROC. Also, the act infringes the doctrine of vertical separation of power and federal comity principle that is provided under Art. 50 (8) of the federal constitution.

4.2. THE PROBLEM OF FORUM SHOPPING

Forum shopping is one of the negative impacts of jurisdictional overlap that is caused by the existence of the blend of multi-state legal intercourse and legal diversity (pluralism) through the use of the jurisdictional options to affect the outcome of a lawsuit. Such incidence occurs where a plaintiff is provided with more than one forum to be chosen by his own calculus of interest. In a federal system, forum shopping exists due to plurality of jurisdiction between federal and states (vertical) and conflict of law among states (horizontal) choice of laws.\textsuperscript{48}

Ethiopia is also subject to the trouble, not only in regular court cases but also in cases of the federal and state constitutional review. In Oromia, for instance, CCI law provides 30 days period of limitation to claim for constitutional interpretation,\textsuperscript{49} whereas the federal CCI law extends the time to 90 days.\textsuperscript{50} So the party, who has been barred by period of limitation in Oromia, can claim his right before federal CCI. Still, according to Oromia CIC officials, if a person claims constitutional review after 30 days, they informally refer or recommend such party to claim before the federal CCI.\textsuperscript{51} This may further expose defendants into a vexatious position because his opponent with the view to weakening him institutes an action in an inconvenient forum. This can be reduced either by ways of demarcating the boundaries of the jurisdiction between federal and state constitutional adjudicator, or through adopting federal choice-of-law rules, which renders the plaintiff a choice between several laws for a given case.\textsuperscript{52}

4.3. WHO IS COMPETENT TO RESOLVE JURISDICTIONAL OVERLAP?

In Ethiopia, we have no clear mechanism or empowered institution to delimit the respective competencies of federal and state constitutional adjudicator,\textsuperscript{53} unlike other federal countries that give the function to the highest court of ordinary judicial structure (such as the USA, Canada, and Australia) or to a specialized court (like Germany and Spain).\textsuperscript{54} While Art.32 of HoF proclamation stipulate, ‘misunderstanding other than border dispute, first can be resolved through peaceful means and discussion’. If this failed, HoF takes the responsibility to give solutions. Here, the term ‘other than border dispute’ in its widest sense extends to deciding over the dispute of jurisdictional overlap between the federal and state constitutional adjudicators.

This assumes the HoF is a more competent body to resolve such conflict. Moreover, as the composition of the members of the HoF reflects the sovereignty of each nations, nationalities, and peoples, on one hand, and they are not regularly engaged in law making that can cause conflict of interest, on the other hand, makes the HoF is in a better position to be assigned to such job. Consequently, based on the scenario of Art. 32 of the HoF proclamation that provides the procedures required to be followed in resolving such misunderstanding; if such kind of dispute arise, the House first facilitate to disputant party to resolve their problem through amicable dispute resolution in order to come up with a win-win solution and only if this fails, it strives to give mandatory decision among parties on the issue.55

5. SCOPE OF MUTUAL RESPONSIBILITY AMONG THE FEDERAL AND OROMIA CONSTITUTIONAL REVIEW ORGANS

5.1. CAN STATES REVIEW THE CONSTITUTIONALITY OF LAWS/ ACTS OF FEDERAL JURISDICTION?

The FDRE Constitution is silent on whether states review the constitutionality of laws or acts of federal jurisdiction. However, there are common issues such as shared powers, fundamental human rights, and delegated jurisdictions which both tiers of government are entrusted with.56 For instance, as per Art. 9(2) of the FDRE Constitution, all federal and state organs should ensure the observance of the constitution, and also, as per Art. 13 to respect and enforce fundamental human rights. In such case, constitutional review is one of the mechanisms to ensure the adherence of constitution and enforcing of such rights.

55 Constitutional Explanatory note, Supra note 12, P. 117.
56 See FDRE Constitution, Art. 9(1-2), 13, 55(5), 55(2a) and 52(2d), 80(4-6).
According to Hamid, if an interested person challenges the decision of Oromia courts or tribunals as it infringes his rights guaranteed in the ROC, the CIC can review such decision even if the case is brought to it based on federal laws.\textsuperscript{57} Because, the claimant challenges the decision of Oromia courts, not the federal law. But, if a person challenges the constitutionality of federal law instead of decision, such case should be brought before the federal CCI.\textsuperscript{58} This implies the Oromia CCI and CIC can't review the constitutionality of federal laws. However, in connection to the jurisdiction of ordinary courts to review the constitutionality issue under the FDRE constitution, several scholars argue regular courts (even if they can't identify whether federal or state or both tier courts) are empowered to adjudicate constitutionality issue with the FDRE Constitution.

For instance, Dr. Assefa, the prominent scholar on Ethiopian Federalism, argues based on the contrario reading of Art. 84(2), \textit{``subordinate regulations issued by the executive and decision of governmental bodies other than ‘laws’ (state and federal proclamation) were left to the courts’’}.\textsuperscript{59}(Emphasis added) In the article, he doesn’t specify which tier of court (federal or state or both) and scope of the power of each court to entertain the case. To the author, this statement can be interpreted into three different scenarios in relation to the power of state courts to review the constitutionality claims on the laws/acts of federal jurisdiction or arise under the FDRE constitution. The first understanding is both the federal and state courts are empowered to see the constitutionality issue of their respective subordinate legislations. The Second scenario is that state courts are empowered to see the constitutionality issue of both federal and state regulation brought before them. The third approach is only federal courts entertain the constitutionality issue of both federal and state regulation and directives.

In this regard, the writer argues state courts are not empowered to see the constitutionality of any federal law. Because, primarily state courts have no original jurisdiction on ‘federal laws’, rather they have delegated jurisdiction. In other words, federal jurisdictions delegated to each level of state courts are the maximum power of those courts on federal law, not minimum. That is why the FDRE Constitution has not empowered state courts to see the basic error of law aroused on federal law. In that sense, constitutionality issue is above error of laws. Thus, if states are not entrusted to entertain basic error of laws of federal jurisdiction, it’s illogical to argue that they can entertain constitutionality issue of federal laws since the constitution is hierarchically above other ordinary laws.

For this reason, if constitutionality issues arise under federal law or with federal constitution in state courts, the courts should refer such matter to the Federal CCI. But, in case where subordinate laws are in dispute with the federal constitution in state courts, the constitution is silent. In the view of the writer, if the issue cannot be resolved by primary legislations based on the principle of avoidance, it's better to refer to federal courts having original jurisdiction on the issue as state courts are not delegated to do so.

Hence, what is left to state courts regarding federal constitution is questionable. The Oromia Regular Courts Re-establishment Proclamation No.141/2008 Art. 3 states, state courts have ‘safeguarding role’ towards both the FDRE and Oromia Constitutions. So, the cumulative reading of Art. 80 (4-6) of the FDRE Constitution that delegates federal jurisdiction to state courts and Art. 3 of Oromia Courts re-establishment proclamation imply that the regional states have to ensure the observance of the federal constitution by correcting unconstitutional decisions through indirect interpretation.

60 See FDRE Constitution, Art. 80 (4-6).
61 The FDRE Constitution delegate states courts to see factual matters of federal jurisdiction. In such case, as delegation exceptional, it should be expressly provided and interpreted narrowly. Thus, the silence of the FDRE Constitution presumed to be a denial of delegation, not only on dealing cassation of the federal jurisdiction, but also constitutional dispute arise under the federal law or with the federal constitution in state courts.
62 Based on the principle of avoidance, if subordinate federal and state laws contravene a primary legislation (proclamation), it is rendered null and void by the very reason of superior laws prevailing over inferior ones. Accordingly, direct constitutional review is the last resort remedy, and the court must attempt to resolve the constitutional issues indirectly through the application of proclamations before testing regulations directly against the constitution. Thus, there would be no need or way to test it immediately against the constitution directly, before comparing its normative content with other primary legislations which could offer solutions. (See Takele Soboka, Judicial Referral of Constitutional Disputes in Ethiopia: From Practice to Theory, African Journal of International and Comparative Law (2011), Vol.19, No.1, P.107.
(principle of avoidance) and, using the provisions of the constitution in their day to day activity other than entertaining constitutional disputes.\footnote{Interview with Mr. Tashoma Girma, Member of Oromia CCI Legal Expert, Finfinne, Jan. 22, 2016.} In this regard, the HoF decision on the case between \textit{Aliy Dawe vs. Mahamad Adem}, also, fortifies this argument.\footnote{\textit{Aliy Dawe vs Mahamad Adam}, HoF decision Sene 18/2007 E.C (June 25, 2015, Unpublished)} In this case, the HoF criticizes both the state and federal courts for non-quashing of sale of land between individuals.
This implies courts have the duty to quash acts like sale of land that are constitutionally prohibited.

5.2. CAN THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTIONAL
ADJUDICATORS REVIEW OROMIA CCI/CIC’S DECISION?

Art. 19 (1) of the HoF Procl. No. 251/2001 stipulates that there should be exhaustion of local remedy at the state level on identity claims with the possibility of review by the HoF. However, with regard to cases other than identity issues no law allows or prohibits whether the decision of states should be reviewed by the federal CCI/HoF. Also, no cases happen yet on the issue. In other federations, such as in USA, Switzerland, and Germany though diversity is still possible in state courts it has to be checked by the top federal judiciary or constitutional court in order to avoid the risk of divergent jurisprudence that is usually considered to be dangerous to the functioning and survival of federalism.\footnote{Celin, \textit{Supra} note 26, P. 320.} In Ethiopia, the FDRE Constitution and ROC, as well as the Oromia CIC law, are hushed on whether the HoF reviews or not, if the state CIC renders decision that contravenes the federal constitution.

However, arguably, even if there is a federal comity, such mutual respect as it should be within the federal constitutional supremacy, various scholars and officials argue as the HoF exceptionally review state constitutional adjudicators decision.\footnote{Confidential Interview with HoF official, Addis Ababa, January 2016; Interview with Melese, \textit{Supra} note 46; Solomon Emiru, \textit{Compatibility of the Revised Oromian National Regional State Constitution with the FDRE Constitution with Respect to Adjudication of...}} Because of, firstly, HoF is the ultimate defender of the constitution and entrusted to correct erroneous decision of any organ against the constitution as per Art. 9 and 62 (1) of the FDRE Constitution. Accordingly, the HoF can review the CIC decision, not for the very reason of involving the FDRE Constitution issue, but if the CIC decision violate the FDRE Constitution. This emphasizes that the FDRE Constitution adopts the doctrine of constitutional supremacy, unlike USA where the Supreme Court can review state decision when it violates the ‘federal law’. 67 This is because USA follows federal law supremacy (paramountcy clause). 68

Another justification for HoF to review the state CIC decision is the consistency clause of Art. 50(5) that apply to all regional laws and acts based on Art. 9 (1) of the FDRE Constitution. So, if any contradiction happens between the Oromia CIC decision and FDRE Constitution, HoF has the duty to ensure consistency principle through reviewing such decision. In addition, as per Art. 13 (2) of both tiers constitution, states are required to interpret chapter three of the constitution in conforming to IHR standards adopted by the country. Hence, if the Oromia CIC decides against such international standard, the HoF is required to correct the decision.

Finally, it is important to address the above arguments effect on states autonomy. In view of that, if the HoF can decide on state divergent rights that are protected in better way, it's against the principle of federal comity as such act amounts to arbitrary intrusion on states exclusive competence. Exceptionally, if such state’s decision will have risk to build one political and economic community and the survival of shared rule of federalism the HoF should have the power to review such decisions. Besides, with respect to convergent matters, the diversity of decision by state constitutional 67 In the USA, based on the Doctrine of ‘adequate and independent state ground’; the Supreme court has no jurisdiction to review a state decision which is adequately based on state grounds. Consequently, state decisions which extend protections beyond those provided by the federal constitution will be respected by the federal courts and will not be subject to review even if the case also raises federal constitutional issues only so long as no ‘federal law’ is violated. (See Celin, Supra note 26, P. 318).

adjudicatars should be respected and tolerated by the federal CCI/HoF unless such judgment clearly infringes the FDRE Constitution. In doing so, the HoF should be careful from over utilizing and misusing its power.

6. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

The current model of constitutional interpretation in Ethiopia is operated by the CCI and the HoF at the federal level. This mandate is assigned to the CIC and State CCI in regional states except for SNNP that entrust the function to Council of Nationalities. The constitutional review organs at both federal and regional level are empowered to perform their function independent of one another. In Ethiopia, there is no legal parameter and institutional frameworks that govern the relationship and the impact of diversity of recognition of rights between the federal and state constitutions. However, even if states are not required to adopt identical rights provided in the FDRE Constitution, they are required to guarantee the protection of the rights at least equal to what is provided in the FDRE constitution. Actually, states including Oromia have included several identical rights, have restricted some rights and have protected some rights better than the federal constitution. Also, the ROC and, the FDRE Constitution do order states to follow the decision of HoF precedent in interpreting the rights guaranteed in the regional constitution.

Jurisdictional overlap on constitutional review between the federal and regional state mechanisms may likely occur on entertaining state laws, and final decisions of government bodies including judgments given on cassation over cassation cases. The Federal CCI and HoF are currently accepting and deciding cases decided by the Federal Supreme Court Cassation bench through cassation over cassation. This limits the Oromia CIC and CCI autonomy to exercise their powers entrusted by the ROC. Also, the problem of forum shopping is observed between each review system particularly in the case of period of limitations.

Further, this paper argues that the HoF is the more appropriate organ to resolve the jurisdictional overlap since the HoF is the ultimate defender of the constitution and reflects the sovereignty of NNP. Elsewhere, regions ensure the observance and respecting to the FDRE Constitution through indirect constitutional interpretation such as correcting unconstitutional decisions or acts and, guided by the provision of the constitution in their regular activity other than disposing of constitutional disputes. Further, the decision of Oromia CIC should not be reviewed by HoF, unless such decision clearly violates FDRE Constitution and is to endanger the survival of federalism.

For aforementioned shortcomings, I forward the following recommendations:

- There should be guiding rules and strong governing institution that regulates the relationship between state and federal constitutional review to balance state autonomous interpretation and national unity principle. In doing so, the rights guaranteed in state constitutions should provide at least equal or better protection than federally guaranteed rights and in the event of the occurrence of lesser protection, there should be a strong institution or mechanisms that correct such errors. To realize this, it is better to establish a separate constitutional court like most European states with which Ethiopia shares the parliamentary system of government.

- In order to reduce the possibility of jurisdictional overlap the boundaries of the jurisdiction between federal and state constitutional review should be clearly demarcated. Consequently, there should be only one jurisdiction where the plaintiff could bring suit, use system of having a federal choice-of-law rules in which the plaintiff has a choice between several laws for a given case and/or through requiring each party first exhaust the remedies of state constitutions.

- The Oromia CIC proclamation, Art. 19(3) and CCI statute, Art. 18(2) should be repealed since it limits the interpretation of fundamental human rights to the HoF decision instead of conforming to the international human rights standards adopted by Ethiopia.

- The Federal CCI and HoF should refer the constitutionality claims that are alleged based on state laws, to the concerned regional constitutional adjudicating organs.
ALLOCATION OF COSTS AND FEES OF CIVIL LITIGATION IN FEDERAL SUPREME COURT CASSATION DIVISION: ‘DOES ONE APPROACH REALLY FIT ALL’?

Kahsay Giday*

ABSTRACT
In civil litigation resolving disputes through the regular courts has its own costs and fees, either compulsory or voluntary, but inevitable. Allocation of these costs and fees is one of the most contentious post-judgment issues in all courts. Litigant parties have competitive interest and claim, while justice and public interest may support either. To adopt the most efficient and equitable allocation system, jurisdictions tend to adopt indemnity, non-indemnity, or judge-based principles with their respective exceptions.

In Ethiopia, the civil procedure law left allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation to the full discretion of courts. Nevertheless, there are no guiding principles on how courts can exercise this discretion. Unlike other jurisdictions that adopted similar approach, the Ethiopian legislature and courts fail to develop uniform guiding rules and principles for allocation of costs and fees. In its decisions, the Ethiopian Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division has adopted the non-indemnity principle rigidly, though it has quashed decision of lower courts for lack of adopting ‘loser pays’ (indemnity) principle.

The main theme of this article is, therefore, to investigate if one approach really fits to all cases irrespective of the outcome of the case, litigation behavior of the parties and costs incurred in light of these theories and principles in a comparative perspective. The article argues that by any standard this approach cannot pragmatically fit to all cases, parties, and litigation. It further argues that lack of research based workable allocation regime is exacerbating the backlog and delay of cases of the Cassation Division.

1. INTRODUCTION

One, if not the main, mechanism of resolving disputes is through the formal proceeding. States have been responsible to open the door of access to justices, essentially in the formal justice machinery. There have been efforts to create conducive environment of access to justice.

As an operative element of a state, there have been clear pressures up on governments to make justice accessible to all. In the wording of Genn, “Every civilized system of government requires that the state should make available to all its citizens a means for the just and peaceful settlement of disputes between them as to their respective legal rights... which every citizen has a constitutional right of access.” To this end, governments have incorporated access to justice in their constitution as a fundamental right. It is not in subordinate laws but in the constitution, which is the supreme law of the land. At the heart of access to justice is access to courts.

In accessing and resolving disputes by using courts, litigant parties incur costs and fees. Once litigant parties incur these costs, they often times, than not, require courts to allocate the costs fairly and equitably. The winner requires them to shift the costs and fees to the loser while the later needs them to do the opposite. Furthermore, courts are required to take into consideration factors beyond the interests and claims of the parties such as equity and public policy.

There are various theories and different practices across jurisdictions with their respective justifications and underlying exceptions. This article deals with the allocation of costs and fees according to Ethiopian Civil Procedure and the existing practice only in the Ethiopian Supreme Court Cassation Division in light of international principles and practices. This article is not a full-fledge discussion of allocation in Ethiopian courts. Suffice it to mention that as an apex court (worth of independent study), which checks appropriate application and interpretation of laws in lower courts, it plays an indispensable role, at least theoretically, in leading the move towards the effective and efficient allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation.

3For instance, see the FDRE Constitution, Art.37.
To this end, section two deals with costs and fees of civil litigation briefly, and section three deals with the theoretical underpinnings of allocation of costs and fees. The fourth section discusses about the Ethiopian version of costs and fees allocation regime while the fifth dwells on whether the ‘one approach fits all’ stand of the Cassation Division is workable. The last section is devoted to conclusion and the way forward drawn from the whole discussion.

2. COSTS OF CIVIL LITIGATION: A BRIEF INSIGHT

Civil justice system⁴, as a wing of the entire justice system, has been urged to offer redress to those whose civil right were violated and sanction those who infringed those rights.⁵ Likewise, parties are expected to protect their rights through the formal system by fulfilling the technical and legal requirements if they opted to litigate. As a side effect of litigation, during any proceeding, there are an inevitable costs incurred by the parties to litigation.⁶ Often times, these are costs and fees to access the courts’ process. There are also costs incurred by the parties to hire a lawyer and to access or use evidences.

There are various definition of costs and fees of litigation. The notion of costs and fees in civil litigation, for the purpose of this article, covers litigation preparation costs, filling costs, lawyer’s cost, accommodation expenses, evidence costs like: compensation for forgone incomes of witness, experts and interpreters-the list is endless.⁷

Paying these costs, litigants need the court to make justice in allocating these costs and fees of litigation. Correspondingly, courts are bound to, among ⁴There are two major components of justice. Namely, Criminal and Civil. Throughout this paper, civil justice comprises all areas of the justice system but not the criminal justice system. It can be taken as a ‘system that enables individuals to assert civil claims against others, and have those rights adjudicated and enforced’.

⁶The word litigation is chosen deliberately to single out the ADR mechanism in all its forms, which are beyond the scope of this paper.

⁷The Ethiopian Civil Procedure Law fails to define what cost is while other many civil procedure laws try to list some elements. For more detail discussion, see The American Law Institute, Principles and Rules of Transnational Civil procedures: American Law Institute/UNIDROIT, (Cambridge University Press, 2006), P45; Stephen M. Gerlis and Paula Loughlin, Civil Procedure, (Great Britain (2001), P370 seq. For UK; Mathias Reimann, ifra note-11, P69 seq. for Austria; P513 seq.; Jack S. Emery et al., West Legal Studies: Thomson Learning, Civil Procedure and Litigation, (USA,2000), P177 seq.
other things, deal fairly; ensure litigant parties are getting equal treatment; the amount of time and money spent on case is proportionate to the amount of the claim and the complexity of the issues, etc.8

However, the parameter of their respective version of ‘fair and equitable allocation’ is divergent. Evidently, the winner party demands the court to shift all the costs and fees of the whole litigation to the loser. Conversely, the loser party demands mostly, either each party should pay their respective costs and fees; or, if the court has to order, it should be ‘reasonable’ amount and only those costs and fees of litigation. In fact, situations realistically may demand courts to take into account factors beyond the sheer interest and perspectives of parties in the litigation. The decision on, ‘who should pay what’, is wide-ranging enough to engulf issues beyond parties.9 For a while, it is safe to conclude that there is no consensus on manner and ways of determining the ‘reasonable amount’ of the litigation costs and its allocation between, if not within, jurisdictions.

From the litigants’ perspective, cost and fee considerations will not only determine the price of access to justice but also will often have an important impact on the strategy, conduct and outcome of litigation.10 That is to say, decision of courts manifestly affects, inter alia, parties’ decisions whether to file or not; the kind of litigation strategy to adopt; how and how much to invest and even whether to use formal mechanisms or not. Improper allocation of the costs and fees may limit access to justice by increasing costs and providing hurdle that prevents and discourages people from accessing the court.11

Likewise, there is also a concern that people may reach a compromise if there is a practice of unfair allocation which seriously limits the constitutional right to appeal. It may also serve as a shield for strategic litigants. If a litigant thinks she/he will lose a great deal of money in case the litigation turned out to be successful or unsuccessful, it will have huge repercussion on the decision to litigate or not. Comparative study of more than 30 jurisdictions indicates, “...in civil ...matters where money is usually the primary object, the financial burden of litigation may well be the single most important consideration in deciding whether to fight in court. Even if a matter is deemed important enough, and even if the chances of success are considered high, a party may not be able or willing to bear the costs of litigation.”

On the contrary, appropriate allocation is believed to increase access to justice and decrease frivolous and unreasonable litigation. Allocation of costs and fees “even provide a basis on which countries compete for legal business.” To address the problems, jurisdictions have adopted various principles of allocation, which are discussed in the following section briefly.

3. APPROACHES OF ALLOCATION OF COSTS AND FEES IN CIVIL LITIGATION: A BRIEF OF LITERATURE REVIEW

Different jurisdictions adopt various methods of allocating the entire costs and fees of litigation. Some adopt the ‘loser pays’ principle, while others adopt parties cover their respective costs. And, yet others leave it to the discretion of the judge. In other terms, the first principle is known as indemnity rule, the second non-indemnity rule while the last is known as judge-based system. Before we jump to discussion of each, it has to be underlined that all systems have principles and exceptions that allow courts to derogate from that principle. For instance, in systems that adopted the loser pays principle courts are allowed to deviate from the principle if law clearly dictates not to shift the costs, bad faith of the winner, if the winner is an indigent etc.\textsuperscript{16}

\textbf{3.1 . LOSER PAYS PRINCIPLE}

In non-indemnity principle, parties are ordered to bear their respective costs and fees of the litigation. The loser pays principle is, by far, the most widely adopted principle.\textsuperscript{17} In this principle, the loser party should prima facie indemnify, or contribute substantially towards, the costs and fees incurred by the winner party.\textsuperscript{18} Those who adopted the ‘loser pays’ (indemnity) principle pursue the full compensation of winning party and deterrence of frivolous claims. The successful litigant can collect his/her legal costs and fees from the loser.

In fact, even within jurisdictions that have adopted the loser pays principle variations are inescapable on how much should be shifted to the loser.\textsuperscript{19} After studying more than 30 jurisdictions comparatively, Mathias made the following eloquent conclusion:

\begin{quote}
\textit{The reality is much more complex: no system makes the winner completely whole (although some come very close), and even in the United States, some costs are shifted to the loser (although usually only a very small part); most jurisdictions operate somewhere in between. ...what basic principle a legal system proclaims says little about which costs (and which amounts) are actually shifted to the loser: some jurisdictions announcing the “loser pays” rule arguably charge the loser for no more than in the United States... The world of cost and fee allocation in civil procedure is much better described as a broad spectrum. On one end are the systems that shift nearly all of the winner’s litigation expenses to the loser; in the middle, we find many jurisdictions shifting} substantial parts, but not nearly the whole; and at the other end, only a fraction of the winner’s costs are recoverable (Emphasis Added)

As can be understood from this conclusion, it is in rare circumstance that “the loser pays all” the costs of the winner incurred during the litigation. Furthermore, the prime purpose of indemnity “is not intended to be compensation for a risk to which a litigant has been exposed, [but] to refund of expenses actually incurred.”\(^{20}\) This rule reflects basic justice. Responsibility for the winner’s costs rests with the party who brought or defended a losing cause.\(^{21}\)

In exceptional circumstances provided by law, the court may withhold or limit costs to the winning party when there is clear justification for doing so.\(^{22}\) For instance, if the case is based on family law, courts can or sometimes even to exempt the loser party from covering the costs and fees of litigation, provided the conditions are fulfilled. To this end, in systems that adopted the loser pays principle, courts are allowed to deviate from the principle if the law clearly dictates not to shift the costs, if the winner is in bad faith, if the winner is an indigent. There are other exceptions like small claim cases, family law disputes, labour cases, social security cases, consumer litigation, tort cases, etc.\(^{23}\)

3.2. NON-INDEMNITY PRINCIPLE

Regarding the systems who have adopted the non-indemnity principle, the justification is, inter alia, “to provide access to the courts for the poor and other risk-averse persons”.\(^{24}\) There is a public need for open access to all. Costs and fees of litigation should not preclude parties from bringing their claims or defending suits brought against them. Accordingly, parties in litigation must generally bear their own expenses. The American Supreme Court has listed the following three illustrative justifications:

“...in many cases the result of litigation is uncertain and, as a result, it is unfair to penalize losing parties by assessing costs and fees for merely defending; if losing parties were forced to bear their opponents' costs and fees, "the poor might be unjustly discouraged from instituting actions to vindicate their rights...; claims for costs and fees would likely increase "the time, expense and difficulties of proof" in any given case and “would pose substantial burdens for the administration of justice.”25(Emphasis added)

Pragmatically speaking, there is no pure dichotomy of ‘loser pays’, indemnity, and ‘each party covers his or her costs’, non-indemnity principles.26 Even in the US that has adopted long tradition of adopting non-indemnity principle there are research based calls for costs and fees shifting for “indemnification would reduce frivolous litigation, improve case quality and lower litigation costs.27 Still those who adopted the hybrid method have principles and exceptions.

3.3 JUDGE-BASED SYSTEM

As the name indicates, this approach holds that the allocation of costs and fee of litigation is decided not by legislation, but, left to the discretion of judges. There are jurisdictions that adopt this approach including South Africa28, Israel29, and Ethiopia. Advocates of this system list many advantages, which are summarized as follows:

28 Cost and Fee Allocation, Supra note 20.
29 Theodore Eisenberg, Supra note 13, P1453.
“A plausible additional approach to allocating litigation costs is to vest full responsibility for assessing them in the institutional actor with case-specific expertise, with no affiliation with the litigating sides, and with a presumed interest in promoting justice as each individual case requires the judge. Such a judge-centered system could, in theory, effectively address the problems associated with the litigation cost allocation methods already described. It might, for example, avoid the systematic underpayment of litigation costs in countries with fixed-amount or percentage-based reimbursement schedules since the judge can adjust the amount awarded as each case warrants. A judge-centered system might also avoid the harshness of litigating parties with reasonable but losing claims having to bear the full litigation costs of their opponents.”

This system gives a judge to decide allocation of costs and fees of litigation on case-by-case basis. It is the most flexible system. However, it lacks predictability; and is uncertain. None of the parties can be able to guess in what circumstances can the court shift or not shift to the other. Judges may also easily abuse it in case the law or Supreme Court fails to come up with practicable guidelines.

To rectify, or at least to reduce, the pitfalls of the unpredictability, jurisdictions have developed clear guiding rules on how courts should exercise the discretion in light of fairness and justice. The discretion is expected to be “exercised judicially in accordance with established principles in relation to the facts of the case.” The guidelines are developed through practice by the courts themselves.

4. ALLOCATION OF COST AND FEES IN ETHIOPIAN CIVIL PROCEDURE LAW

This section provides indispensable background information about the Ethiopian legal rules governing the civil litigation costs and fees vis-à-vis its practice in the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division.

4.1 ALLOCATION IN THE CIVIL PROCEDURE LAW

As discussed in section 3 of this research, there are various theories and practices adopted by jurisdictions with their respective justifications. The Civil Procedure Code of Ethiopia, which is designed to regulate the process of civil litigations, has plainly left allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation to the discretion of courts as follows:

Unless otherwise provided, the costs of an incident to all suits shall be in the discretion of the court and the court shall have a full power to decide by whom or out of what property and to what extent such costs are to be paid and to give all necessary directions to this effect.33 (Italics added)

According to this provision, courts in Ethiopia have a full power to make a decision regarding not only the amount but also who should pay. The only limitation is ‘if provided otherwise’. As it is discernible from the provision, the law gives unlimited power to the courts to decide who should pay, from what property and to what extent the party should pay.

There is slight difference in the wording of the Amharic and English versions of the provision. First, the Amharic version states that ‘unless it is provided by other laws’ whereas the English version states, “Unless otherwise provided” with no indication as to how and by whom it is provided.

In the wording of the English version, it leaves a room for parties to agree or law can dictate otherwise; but, in the Amharic version no indication as to the first. There are many unanswered questions. Of these, firstly, can this be interpreted, as courts have no discretion to decide if the parties, especially the loser, are able to show special circumstances? Secondly, the English version makes it mandatory for the court to have full power by using “shall” while the wording of the Amharic version connotes the possibility. The Ethiopian Civil Procedure provides courts to decide allocation of costs and fees on case-by-case basis.

This gives them maximum flexibility to accommodate changing circumstances taken into consideration the nature of the litigation, behavior of the parties, time taken etc. to make equitable and fair allocation of costs decisions. Nonetheless, the pitfall of this unlimited power lies at creating legal uncertainty due to the unlimited power and lack of guidelines on how the courts should apply their conscience, evidences, and the facts to make fair and equitable decisions.

Nevertheless, if the judge decides that the “unsuccessful party should pay” then the party for whose advantage the allocation of costs and fees has been decided “shall prepare an itemized bill of costs showing the expenses he has incurred in the suit.” Likewise, the law requires the party to file the bill in the court of judgment and a copy of that bill be served to the other party. This in turn, indicates that the laws are in favor of litigation, oral or otherwise, on the issues of allocation of costs and fees in civil matters. This can further be substantiated by the rule that follows and demands the court to adjourn the case for “considering the bill and shall summon the parties to appear on such day.” Furthermore, the court is authorized to reduce the amount “which in its opinion is excessive and …were not necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for the defending of the rights of any party” provided that it considers the bill and hear the parties.

High emphasis is given to the allocation of costs and fees of litigation though the law fails to expound on what grounds the court can ‘shift or not shift’ the costs and fees. Especially, after the court makes a decision as to the allocation of cost and fee, the law provides serious consequences if any party deviates from the order of the court. In a similar manner, the law clearly demands that court once it renders its judgment concerning the allocation of costs and fees, it has to include in its decree, operational part of the judgment, “the amount of costs incurred in the suit or appeal, and by whom, or out of what property such costs are to be paid”\textsuperscript{37} It has to be noted that parties can appeal on the allocation of costs and fees but such appeal is final.\textsuperscript{38}

4.2 ALLOCATION OF COSTS AND FEES IN FDRE FEDERAL SUPREME COURT CASSATION DIVISION

The Federal Supreme Court is the highest judicial organ in the Ethiopian federal judicial system.\textsuperscript{39} Its counterpart in the regions has similar position on regional matters.\textsuperscript{40} Currently, the decisions of the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division are binding on all levels of courts. In the wording of the Federal Courts Re-amendment Proclamation “interpretation of a law by the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division in its judgments made with not less than five judges shall be binding on federal and regional courts at all levels.”\textsuperscript{41} It is there, to correct fundamental error of law for the purpose of uniform applications and interpretations of law.\textsuperscript{42}

In exercising this power, the apex court has made many binding interpretations concerning ‘error of laws’. So far, the Division has published 20 volumes of its binding decisions. One of these is regarding allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation. In reversing and elaborating lower courts’ decisions, the Cassation Division has made it clear that the principle adopted \textsuperscript{37} Civil Procedure Code of the Empire of Ethiopia Decree No. 52/1965, Art.183 (1) (e).

\textsuperscript{38} Civil Procedure Code of the Empire of Ethiopia Decree No. 52/1965, Art. 466.
\textsuperscript{39} FDRE Constitution, Art.80.
\textsuperscript{40} It is worth mentioning that the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division is currently exercising Cassation over Cassation on any matters decided by Federal and State courts; though Scholars are raising critical questions. For detail discussions Muradu Abdo, Review of Decisions of State Courts over Sate Matters by the Federal Supreme Court, Mizan Law Review (2007),Vol.1. No.1, Pp60-74; Mehari Redae, Cassation over Cassation and its Challenges in Ethiopia, Mizan Law Review (2015), Vol.9, No.1, Pp175-200.
\textsuperscript{41} See Federal Courts Re-amendment Proclamation No.454/2005, Art. 2 (4).
\textsuperscript{42} The Decision of FSCCD should not be equated with enacting laws. Its power is limited only to rectify the fundamental error of law, “guarding the legislature’s purpose and intent”, committed in interpretation. If the Cassation division acts in the other way, it is another act that amounts to interference of powers of the legislature. For critical analysis of the flaws in the decisions of the cassation, see Bisrat Teklu and Markos Debebe, Change for Aptness: Fighting Flaws in the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division available at https://www.ju.edu.et/jl last accessed 21/09/2017.
in Ethiopian procedure law is principally the ‘loser pays’ principle. The Division confirms that whether the loser should pay or not, is left for the discretion of the courts, utterly of which the loser pays, is an option. In these same cases, the Division also adopted some guiding exceptions to the basic rule.

Of the 20 volumes of binding decisions of the Division, there are four pertinent cases worth of special discussion. The writer opted to discuss in ascending order of the published volume as follows.

4.2.1 Case One

In Abebaye Abi Deraweq V. Ato Yigerem Feye case, the court that had first instance jurisdiction rejected both the claim and costs of the petitioner (Wro. Abebaye Abi). The petitioner had appealed to appellate court which confirmed the decision of the lower court regarding the recovery of the court fees, though dismissed the claim. Then, she petitioned to the Cassation Division to reverse the decision of the appellate court arguing, “If the claim of the plaintiff is rejected by the court, it is error of law to order the defendant to pay the costs of the litigation who has won.” Then, the Cassation Division has reversed the decision of the Supreme Court stating “according Art. 251(1) of the Civil Procedure Code of Ethiopia, court fees are covered by person who is suing unless allocated by the court otherwise.” It further held that if the respondent made unfounded claims which were dismissed both by the appellate and lower courts; there is no legal ground that the defendant had to cover the costs and fees. Ordering the petitioner to indemnify the respondent is, therefore, is wrong interpreting of the law which has to be corrected. Here the Cassation Division is right if the loser pays principle is to be followed; the reverse would be true. That is to say, the defendant has won the case, and then plaintiff may be ordered to indemnify the reasonable costs and fees of the litigation.

45 The decisions of these cases are rendered in Amharic and the writer provides translation.

Unfortunately, the Cassation Division reversed the decisions of the lower courts though it ordered the parties to cover their respective costs in the Cassation. As can be discerned from facts of the case the petitioner has come from Gambela region, hired a lawyer to defend the case, court fees incurred in the Cassation Division, appeal including court fees, evidence and other costs. The Cassation Division ignored the principle of the loser pays principle, which has been claimed to be adopted by lower courts.

4.2.2. Case Two
The petitioner, Ethiopian Revenue and Customs Authority Dire Dawa Branch, has argued that the issue of allocation of costs and fees has to be entertained in the execution file not on the judgment file, which has already become dead file.\textsuperscript{47} The Cassation Division has dismissed the argument of the petitioner and affirmed the decision of lower courts by stating litigation of allocation of costs and fees should be presented at the court where the judgment was rendered in a file of a judgment pursuant to Art.183 of the Ethiopian Civil Procedure Code, for it is part of the judgment. Likewise, execution is possible on a matter up on which judgment is rendered by virtue of Art.378 of the same Code. It further states that courts should exercise their discretion by allowing parties to litigate on the issue of allocation, amount and even whether the costs and fees claimed by the party are really incurred or not.

4.2.3. Case Three
In another case, the Division holds that the main objective of the rules of costs and fee is to prevent frivolous litigation.\textsuperscript{48} Then, if [lower] courts affirm that the litigation has no legal basis, the party who causes those costs

\textsuperscript{47} For detail facts of the case, see \textit{Ethiopian Revenue and Customs Authority Dire Dawa Branch V. W/ro Hindea Endris, Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division}, File No. 83701, Vol.14, Pp129-130.

\textsuperscript{48} For detail facts of the case, see \textit{Youtek Construction Plc V. Ato Fuad et al, Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division}, File No. 91103, Vol.15 and Vol.16, Pp 188-190.
and fees should indemnify the party who sustained unnecessary costs. Likewise, the Division added, that it can be discerned from the contents of the Civil Procedure provisions that the ‘loser pays’ does not mean that the loser pays all the costs and fees incurred by the winner. Conversely, the Cassation Division stressed that it is also against the objective of the civil procedure to reject the question of costs and fees indemnification if the party who is causing them is in bad-faith. After giving this reasoning, the Division has reversed the decisions of the lower courts who have denied the winning party while the loser is in bad faith.\footnote{Ibid.} The Cassation Court criticized lower courts for failing to give decision on the issue of shifting or not shifting of the costs and fees of the litigation.\footnote{Ibid.}

Regrettably, the Division left uncertainty whether courts should only adopt the loser pays principle in case of bad faith. That is to say, is bad faith the precondition to decide the costs and fees to follow the judgment? Can the indemnity cost be justified by the mere fact that loser has been found to be wrong, in fact or law? Alternatively, is any misconduct a requirement? Are there circumstances where parties are ordered to cover the costs of each side? These and other similar questions are left unanswered by the Cassation’s decision.

Unfortunately, the principle adopted by the Division was not even applied to the costs and fees incurred in the Division’s litigation of the same case. In fact, the winner who has been denied appropriate cost recovery by lower courts is also denied in the Division. What the Division did was, it remanded the case to the lower courts to decide on ‘allocation of costs and fees’ while the parties are ‘ordered to bear their respective’ costs and fees of litigation incurred in the Division.

4.2.4. Case Four

In this case, after ordering the winner party to provide bill of costs, lower courts have rendered a decision, inter alia, on allocation of costs and fees of the litigation.\footnote{See Ato Kinfe W/jinbet Vs. Ato Sileshi Bekele et al., Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division, File No. 98593, Vol. 18, Pp96-99.} The loser has presented his petition to the Cassation Division, among others, to reverse the decision by arguing that lower courts have committed fundamental error of law to render the decision and if the decision is reversed then there is no issue to indemnify. The Cassation Division has affirmed the decisions of lower courts by stating that allocation of costs and fees by ordering the loser to indemnify the winner as far as the courts can render their decision based on litigation stand, contracting parties’ identity and other similar circumstances. Here, the Cassation Division seems impliedly, to list some guiding principles that lower courts should take into consideration.

However, the Cassation Division ordered the parties to bear their respective costs and fees incurred at the Cassation Division, irrespective of the outcome of the case, costs incurred, stand of the parties and their litigation behavior. The winner of the litigation has incurred visible costs like advocate fees, court fees, forgone opportunity costs and other costs to defend the case.

In all its published binding decisions, including the cases under-discussion, the Division rigidly follows one approach; each side of the litigation should cover the costs of litigation irrespective of the nature of the case, behavior of the parties before or during litigation, costs covered, time taken to complete the case etc.\textsuperscript{52}

4.3. DOES THE ONE ALLOCATION APPROACH FIT ALL?

One may argue that the prime purpose of Cassation Division is not to entertain cases as regular courts but to check of if the laws are correctly applied and interpretation by all courts in their respective jurisdiction. It reverses if courts of any level have committed fundamental error of law, not to entertain the facts of the case. Consequently, allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation is not a fundamental issue at the Cassation Division.

However, this argument does not make sense for a number of reasons. First, every-litigation has its own costs and the right person should pay that cost. Parties pay huge cost to proof their claim or defend claims brought against them. Court fees, advocate fee, transport and accommodation costs are only some of these costs incurred. Second, if lower courts erred in interpreting or applying laws and have awarded costs mistakenly, it would be unjust for the party who has won in reversing the judgment. For this person winning may be turned to be losing in reality given the huge costs and delay of decisions in the Federal Cassation. Third, even though the loser party committed no fault at all, this does not mean that the winner party should shoulder the costs and fees alone. Fourth, if the Division is desired to provide justice then, it should render justice fully, from all perspectives. Fifth, if the Division is to correct ‘fundamental error of law’ it should incorporate laws of allocation of costs and fees. Six, if lower courts are required to adopt the ‘loser pays’ principle why not the Cassation Division. In one system, how can one expect different approaches, at least, theoretically? Is the spirit and letter of the law demands courts to shift the costs and fees towards the loser in bad-faith; is the Division above the law?

Adopting the non-indemnity principle inflexibly all times, for all parties, in all cases irrespective of the outcome of the case would keep on, the existing public outcry, backlog and delay of cases. It would be absurd to treat all individuals, petitioners and respondents, identical while justice demands otherwise. What if the losing party petitioned with a full knowledge of the outcome of the case? What, if that party or his advocate clearly contributed to the wrong interpretation of laws at lower courts?

Even the loser who acted in bad faith showing illegitimate behavior in the courtroom to win the baseless or vexatious claims will pay no costs and fees of the litigation initiated inappropriately to merely harass the winner party. It would be unjust and incomprehensible for it is a matter of inherent justice that the person who causes damage intentionally to others should make it good. 53

To decrease unfounded harassment and frivolous litigation, losers with bad faith should pay the costs and fees of civil litigation at the Division. The party who lost the case due to his/her frivolous claims must bear the costs thereof to deter similar acts and conducts if it is proportional and the winner acted in good faith.

However, caution must be taken that the practice of the Cassation Division must not deter reasonable and meritorious claims for fear of incongruous allocation of costs.\textsuperscript{54} If the Division adopted the loser pays all, petitioners who have no financial capability to cover the costs and fees of the whole litigation would be discouraged to bring their case to the courts.

The downsides of one-approach fits-all-cases should be reducing by adopting hybrid system that incorporates maximum amount of attributes of the three systems while keeping pitfalls to the least possible. To this end, the Division should develop workable guiding principles that helps to build a more efficient and equitable allocation system. The system should provide fairness to prevailing litigants if justice demands so. Above all, "making parties financially responsible for unreasonable claims and defenses will not only release wholly justified victorious parties from their financial burdens but also free up the courts, to hear more meritorious cases."\textsuperscript{55} The costs of litigation are expected to be more affordable and more proportionate to the value and complexity of the case.

If the current approach of Cassation Division persists, winning means practically losing. Coupled with the high costs and delay of dispensation of Cassation cases, the 'one-approach fits all' cases and parties at all time will continue dismissing the sense of effective and equitable allocation of costs and fees system. Above all, the non-indemnity principle would not be always consistent with promoting just, cost-effective and efficient resolution of disputes.

5. CONCLUSION AND THE WAY FORWARD

Courts have full discretion of allocating costs and fees of litigation in Ethiopia. This discretion is guided by neither clear practically drawn rules nor legislative rules that can reduce the dangers of wide discretion. The 'devil' is observable in the practice. As can be discerned from the cases discussed in this article, section 4, there are divergent practices of allocation of cost and fees of civil litigation. Besides, the Cassation Division of the Supreme Court has adopted one ‘approach fits all’.

One may argue that the prime purpose of Cassation Division is not to entertain cases as regular courts but to check if the laws are correctly applied and interpretation by all courts in their respective jurisdiction. It reverses if courts of any level have committed fundamental error of law, not to entertain the facts of the case. Consequently, allocation of costs and fees of civil litigation is not a fundamental issue at the Cassation Division.

However, this argument does not make sense for a number of reasons. First, every-litigation has its own costs and the appropriate person should pay that cost. Parties pay huge cost to proof their claim or defend claims brought against them. Court fees, advocate fee, transport and accommodation costs are only some of these costs incurred. Second, if lower courts erred in interpreting or applying laws and have awarded costs mistakenly, it would be unjust for the party who has won in reversing the judgment. For this person winning may be turned to be losing in reality given the huge costs and delay of decisions in the Federal Cassation. Third, even though the loser party committed no fault at all, this does not mean that the winner party should shoulder the costs and fees alone. Fourth, if the Division is desired to provide justice, then it should render justice fully, from all perspectives. Fifth, if the Division is to correct ‘fundamental error of law’, it should incorporate laws of allocation of costs and fees. Six, if lower courts are required to adopt the ‘loser pays’ principle why not the Cassation Division. In one system, how can one expect different approaches, at least, theoretically? Is the spirit and letter of the law demands courts to shift the costs and fees towards the loser in bad-faith; is the Division above the law?

The author argues that this rigid approach is practically dismissing the need to have efficient and equitable allocation of costs and fees. He calls the court to discourage bad faith litigants whose acts/behaviors is defeating the prime purpose of effective and efficient resolution of disputes, through courts, by bringing petitions based on mere dissatisfaction with the courts’ conclusions and even intended to harass parties declared winners by the courts to the extent of eroding trust and confidence on the justice system.

Treating all litigants, petitioners and respondents, identically would dismiss the very nature of building efficient and equitable system of allocation of costs and fees of litigation. How can one expect courts to treat individuals found in bad faith either in the actions that led to the litigation or in the conduct of litigation be treated identically with those who are innocent and their right is violated by those who acted in bad-faith: vexatious, wantonly or for oppressive reasons.

To decrease unfounded harassment and frivolous litigations, losers with bad faith should pay the costs and fees of civil litigation at the Cassation Division. The party who lost the case due to his/her frivolous claims must bear the costs of that to deter similar acts and conducts.

However, caution must be taken that the practice of the Cassation Division must not deter reasonable and meritorious claims for fear incongruous allocation of costs. If the Division adopted the ‘the draconian loser pays all approach’, petitioners who have no financial capability to cover the costs and fees of the whole litigation and other individuals whose real situation demands special treatment would be discouraged to bring their case to the courts.

By decreasing frivolous and unreasonable litigation, the Federal Supreme Court Cassation Division can alleviate case delay and backlog arising from an overwhelming number of meritorious and frivolous cases. The Cassation Division should deliver a strong message to bad faith and frivolous litigants to think very carefully to petition to it or be ready to pay the price of failure.

Lower courts should allocate costs and fees of litigation taking it seriously and appropriately. The Supreme Court must urgently provide research based detailed working guideline and the Cassation Division must develop by its practice clear case that can vividly lead lower courts to practice efficient and equitable allocation of costs and fees.

The legislature should reform the Civil Procedure Law to meet the up-to-date demands and developments of allocation of costs and fees regime.

ABSTRACT
This article critically examines the way civil case judgments are being rendered and written in Oromia Regional State Courts by taking Ethiopian Civil Procedure Code of 1965 and principles of judgment writing as a framework, and analyzing data gathered through interview, questionnaire, and case review to know the practical problems and their root causes. The overall finding of the research shows the existence of legal and practical problems in rendering and writing effective civil judgments both at first instance and appellate courts of the Region. On balance, however, the problems are more prevalent at first instance courts than appellate courts. These problems are mainly attributable to inadequacy of the law, misinterpreting provisions of the law, judges’ unethical behavior, lack of giving due attention to cases by judges, poor internal controlling mechanisms to ensure accountability of the judges, the existence of case load on judges, weak cooperation of courts’ stakeholders, and etc. Accordingly, the article recommends the revision of Ethiopian Civil Procedure Code, continuous training for judges, strengthening internal controlling mechanisms to ensure accountability, increasing the number of judges in line with the existing case load, and enhancing cooperation of courts’ stakeholders.

THE SHARE OF WOMEN DURING SUCCESSION UNDER STATE LAWS AND SHARIA LAW: COMPARATIVE STUDY

Mohammed Ibrahim*

ABSTRACT

The Federal Democratic Republic of Ethiopian Constitution recognizes equality of gender and prohibits all forms of discrimination against women. Equality of share on inheritance is one of the mechanisms through which the equality of two genders is recognized under the Constitution. At the same time, the Constitution recognizes the adjudication of disputes relating to personal and family laws in accordance with religious or customary laws, with the consent of the parties to the dispute. However, Sharia Courts which are established pursuant to this recognition and apply substantive Sharia laws (succession laws) allow women to inherit half of men which is totally distinctive from equality clause recognized under the Constitution. Since legal pluralism that is recognized in this manner presupposes the acceptance of overlapping rule or potential difference between multiplicities of legal orders, according to the author, decisions rendered by Sharia courts (that apply Islamic succession law) should not be expected to meet standards of the Constitution as long as the procedural requirements to institute a case before Sharia courts (which require the consent of the litigating parties to be adjudicated in a Sharia court) are fulfilled. It is also better if the share given to women under Islamic succession law is considered from the perspectives of the reason that justifies it and not from the perspectives of constitutional order.

Key words: Sharia Law, State Law, Sharia Court, State Succession Law, Sharia Succession Law

validity of non-state or unofficial laws such as customary and religious laws in some fields of social activity. It provides that: "This Constitution shall not preclude the adjudication of disputes relating to personal and family laws in accordance with religious and customary laws, with the consent of the parties to the dispute. Particulars shall be determined by law." The same constitution also stipulates that: “pursuant to sub-article 5 of Article 34 the House of Peoples’ Representative and State Councils can establish or give official recognition to religious and customary courts. Religious and customary courts that had state recognition and functioned prior to the adoption of the Constitution shall be organized on the basis of recognition accorded to them by this Constitution.”

It is based on this constitutional framework that Sharia Courts that deal with some personal disputes have been established. To date, Sharia Courts that apply Islamic law are the only religious courts that have been officially established both at the federal and state levels. Sharia Courts apply only Islamic law.

In Ethiopia, the jurisdiction of Sharia courts is drawn from the Constitution and Federal Courts of Sharia Consolidation Proclamation that was promulgated pursuant to the above Articles of the FDRE Constitution. The FDRE Constitution does not directly determine the specific jurisdiction granted to Sharia courts, but rather recognizes the possibility of settlement of personal disputes by customary and religious systems. It does not define the personal matters amenable to the jurisdiction of such systems. However, the Constitution provides the general areas of competence (i.e., personal matters) and the condition attached (i.e., consent of parties) to the exercise of jurisdiction by Sharia courts. The specific types of cases falling within the competence of Sharia courts are defined under the Federal Courts of Sharia Consolidation Proclamation.

The proclamation provides that the court has the jurisdiction on *any question regarding Wakf, gift/Hiba/, succession of wills; provided that the endower or donor is a Muslim or the deceased was a Muslim at the time of his death.*7 Following, the proclamation stipulates that *the courts shall have jurisdiction over the aforementioned matters only where, pursuant to the provisions of Article 34 sub-article (5) of the Constitution, the parties thereof have expressly consented to be adjudicated under Islamic law.*8 According to this provision, Sharia courts can entertain issues related to succession by applying Islamic law provided that parties are interested to litigate their cases before these courts.

In Ethiopia, historically the settlement of personal and family matters has been based on each community’s religions and customary norms. Personal and family affairs are intrinsically tied to the preservation of one’s culture and identity. That is why the government moves to recognize the Sharia courts to adjudicate in this area. Adjudicating personal and family matters by religious and customary norms involves sensitivity and for this reason it is taken as an indicator to the right to be governed by one’s own religious law and enjoyment to the freedom of religion. This is the case, especially in area where family and personal matters are entertained through religious and customary rules since the time immemorial. Hence, the establishment of Sharia courts in Ethiopia has enormous significance particularly in areas where Islam has a stronghold and the communities are religious or cultural. Its establishment is also very important in terms of the population size of Muslim community it serves throughout the country and the court congestion it reduces in regular court.

As it is known, state laws have recognized absolute equality of share on succession between men and women.9 Contrary to this, women in Islamic law are allowed to inherit a half of the men’s share most of the time. This makes many people in Ethiopia to think Sharia succession law as unjust to women. They believe that succession law of Sharia does not recognize gender equality. This leads not only the followers of other religion but also the followers of this religion into confusion and results in disobedience among the followers. According to the author, that is why most of Ethiopian Muslims, specially the females may prefer to litigate through state regular court seeking absolute equality of share with men. For the author such kind of attitude towards Islamic law is without merit. It emanates from lack of knowledge on what legal pluralism presupposes and true sense of Islamic laws. In order to avoid such kind of attitude, the role of state, media, school of laws, and scholars are very vital.

This article comparatively tries to examine the share of women during succession under Islamic and state laws. The discussion is based only on the analysis of the relevant legal provisions related to the share of women during inheritance under Islamic and State laws with a view to draw a conclusion. It does not concern with actual problem that can be seen on the ground. Structurally, the article is divided into six parts. Following this introductory part, part two tries to discuss the equality of men and women in general under international and state laws. Part three tries to describe the share of women during inheritance both under Sharia and state laws. Part four describes about the concept of pluralism under the FDRE constitution. It also measures the constitutionality of women´s share on succession under Islamic law in line with the principle enshrined under the FDRE constitution, that is, equality of women´s share on succession. Part five tries to describe the reason why women are made to inherit half of men´s share under Sharia law in conjunction with State laws. Finally, part six provides conclusions and recommendations.

2. EQUALITY OF MEN AND WOMEN UNDER INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS AND NATIONAL LAWS

The equality of men and women is an issue that was debatable for a long period of time. Now, internationally ratified treaties recognize absolute equality between men and women. Some of these treaties are International Covenant on Civil and Political Right, The International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Right, The Convention of Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, and Convention of Right of Children’s. Ethiopia is the signatory of these treaties. The treaties recognize the equality of men and women in all matters and prohibit any form of discrimination between the two sex.\textsuperscript{10}

For example, International Covenant on Elimination of All Form of Discrimination against Women (UN, CEDAW, 1979) defines discrimination which made against women based on sex as:

“…..any discrimination, exclusion or restriction made on the bases of sex which has the effect or purpose of impairing or nullifying the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by women irrespective of their marital status, on bases of equality of men and women, of human right and ....in economic, social, cultural, civil or any other field.”\textsuperscript{11}
```

International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR, 1966) also defines discrimination against women based on sex as:

“Any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference which is based on any ground such as race, color, sex, language, religion, political, or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status, and which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing the recognition, enjoyment or exercise by all persons, on an equal footing, of all right and freedom.”\textsuperscript{12}

Equality that is conferred in this manner is based on the assertion that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and right.\textsuperscript{13} This again presupposes the right and responsibility of men and women as equal and same.

\textsuperscript{11}International Covenant on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women, Adopted by General Assembly (CEDAW), 16 December 1979, Art.1.

\textsuperscript{12}International Convention on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR,Commentary,1966), Art.26.

According to the FDRE Constitution, all international agreements ratified by Ethiopia have the status of national law.\textsuperscript{14} Furthermore, the Constitution obliges the interpretation of fundamental rights and freedoms stated under chapter three in a manner conforming to universal declaration of human right, international human right covenant and other relevant international instrument which Ethiopia has ratified.\textsuperscript{15} For this reason, the equality of men and women without any discrimination based on sex is made fundamental right and freedom under chapter three of the FDRE Constitution.

The Constitution guarantees equality before the law and equal protection of the law. Accordingly, it states that all persons are equal before the law and are entitled without discrimination to equal protection of the law.\textsuperscript{16} The provision stipulates that “the law shall guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection without discrimination on grounds of race, nation, nationality or other social origin, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property, birth or other status.”\textsuperscript{17} To ensure that other laws are compatible with the constitutional provisions on equality, some laws, including the 1960 Civil Code provisions on family law and the 1957 Penal Code were revised in 2000 and 2004 respectively.

Under the FDRE Constitution, one article is totally devoted to list the specific rights of women and titled as ‘Rights of Women’.\textsuperscript{18} This article reiterates the right to equality of men and women in the enjoyment of rights and the protection provided for by the Constitution.\textsuperscript{19} The provision also states the equal rights of women and men in marriage, employment, and property ownership and administration.\textsuperscript{20} Moreover, the provision prohibits laws, customs, practices that oppress or cause harm to women and it champions affirmative action for women to rectify the inequality between men and women in the political, social and economic realms.\textsuperscript{21} Under its Art.91(1), the Constitution also promised to support the growth and enrichment of cultures and traditions that are compatible with fundamental rights, human dignity, democratic norms and ideals, and the provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution thus provides a strong protection to the rights of women and forbids discrimination against them.

3. THE SHARE OF WOMEN DURING SUCCESSION UNDER STATE AND ISLAMIC LAWS

As per the above discussion, one of the mechanisms by which the equality of men and women is recognized is through the enjoyment of equal share during succession. As it is commonly known, in most of the customs in Ethiopia as it was elsewhere in the past, male children are favored to succeed their parents. As it is also commonly known, in some nationalities, female children are totally precluded from succeeding their parents. That is why the FDRE Constitution recognizes the property right of women and their equal enjoyment of inheritance with men during succession. It provides this fact as follows:

“Women have the right to acquire, administer, control, use and transfer property. In particular, they have equal rights with men with respect to use, transfer, administration and control of land. They shall also enjoy equal treatment in the inheritance of property”.

Since the Constitution is the cornerstone of all laws, in no ways men and women inherit unequal share in Ethiopia because of this constitutional provision. The idea under the constitution is further corroborated by proclamation no.165 of 1960 which reads as: “Each of them shall receive an equal portion of the succession.” Hence, according to the Ethiopian succession law children or other descendants are number one candidates to succeed a person and all children of the person who died have equal rights in the succession irrespective of their age, sex, etc. differences. Also, Ethiopian law of succession makes no distinction based on the status of a child whether such child is born in marriage, outside a wedlock marriage or

he/she is an adopted child. An adopted child, for all intents and purposes, is assimilated to a natural child. Therefore, the state law does not make any distinction among children of the deceased based on the fact that they are legitimate or otherwise.25

There is also other similar provision that ensures the equality of share between men and women during inheritance under Civil Code of 1960. It is provided as follow: “The sex, age, and nationality of the heir shall not affect in any way the ascertainment of his rights to succession.”26 This is to mean that no distinctions are made on any ground such as sex, age, nationality, etc. to succeed the deceased among heirs and all inherit equal portion of share irrespective of their differences.

However, Islamic law has a different approach. Under Islamic law, women are not allowed to inherit equal to men. They are entitled to inherit half of men although this is not without exception. Sometimes, women in Islam are allowed to inherit equal or above men. Except in these circumstances, in principle, women in Islam are allowed to inherit only half of men. The three types of women who inherit equal, above, and half of men are categorized here in under, respectively.

The women who are entitled to inherit equal to men are uterine sisters and mothers of the deceased. In the presence of children, the mother and the father of the deceased each allowed to inherit one sixth (1/6) of the estate of the deceased.27 Also, the female uterine sisters inherit equally with her uterine brothers.28

In a situation where the deceased is a female and she has died without leaving behind any children, sister and brother, the women are entitled to inherit more than men. But, the only surviving heirs (husband/and both parent) inherits half after payment of any debts and bequest. Then, the mother is given 1/3 of the estate, but the father inherits 1/6. Here, the mother is inheriting double of the father.29

Except in the above situations, the remaining all types of women in Islam are permitted to inherit only half of men’s share. Here are the instances of the case:30

- The daughter inherits half of what the son/her brother inherits;
- The wife inherits 1/8 of her husband property if he died while the husband inherit ¼ his wife property if she died (this is in a situation where they are survived by a children);
- The wife inherits ¼ of her husband property if he died while the husband inherits ½ of his wife property if she died (this is in a situation where they have not survived by a children);
- If the deceased is not survived by any children and parents, the sister of the deceased inherits half of what the brothers of the deceased inherit.

In pre-Islamic Arab society, women were not allowed to inherit. It was discriminatory system that confined only to patrilineal line (hereditary from male to male).31 Such kinds of inheritance that follow the paternal line only were true to all ancient civilized state.32 It was after the coming of Islam that women are allowed to inherit in Muslim Community.

The first verse of Qur’an that recognize the right to inherit for women reads as, “There is share for men and share for women from what is left by parents and those nearest related, whether (the property be) small or large- a legal 29 Ibid.

30 Ibid.
31 In pre-Islam Arab society, women were not entitled to inherit from their parents, husbands, or other relatives because they believe that inheritance should only be granted to those who could ride a horse, fight, gain war booties and help, protect the tribe and territory (See Abdul Rahman Alsheha, Women in the Shade of Islam (3rd ed., 2000), P.17.
32 For example, Women’s in ancient civilized Hindu had no financial nor civil right and were oppressed and humiliated through their lives. They were never allowed to inherit a property in a ways. Women under ancient civilized Rome suffer the same thing. They suffered oppression and rejection in all aspects of social, civil, political, financial life. They were deprived the right of inheritance. Id,P.23 share.” This verse of the Qur´an recognizes the right of inheritance for the women. No one can deprive this right from them. Since the Qur´an is the cornerstone of all laws under Islamic law, in no ways women are deprived the right of inheritance whether the amount of share is small or large. Under Islamic law, the first degree heir that is called to succession at one time is twelve. Out of these primary heirs, the female inheritors are eight in numbers. Except in a situation that is mentioned here in above, most of them inherit half of men. In the above verse of Qur´an, the sex and age of the heir shall not affect in any way the ascertainment of his/her rights to succession. This is to mean that no distinctions are made on any ground such as sex and age to succeed the deceased among heirs even if there is variation on the amount to be inherited.

Islamic law of succession also makes distinction based on the status of a child. Under Islamic law, no legal paternity exists between a father and his illegitimate child, and illegitimacy precludes the existence of any legal bond between the blood relatives of the father on the one hand, and illegitimate child and its issue on the other. Hence, since there is no legal tie between a father and his illegitimate child, or between their respective “legal” relatives, the root cause of inheritance does not exist.

4. FDRE CONSTITUTIONAL MATTER, LEGAL PLURALISM, AND WOMEN INHERITANCE UNDER ISLAMIC LAW

Legal pluralism is the incorporation or recognition of customary law norms or institutions within state law, or the independent coexistence of indigenous norms and institutions alongside state law. It is based on this idea that the FDRE Constitution provides the framework for laws such as customary and religious laws in some fields of social activity. It provides that:

This Constitution shall not preclude the adjudication of disputes relating to personal and family laws in accordance with religious and customary law, with the consent of the parties to the dispute. Particulars shall be determined by law\textsuperscript{38}.

It also stipulates that:

\textit{Pursuant to sub-article 5 of Article 34, the House of Peoples’ Representatives and State Councils can establish or give official recognition to religious and customary courts that had state recognition and functioned prior to the adoption of the constitution shall be organized on the basis of recognition accorded to them by this constitution.}\textsuperscript{39}

In order to execute this constitutional provisions dealing with legal pluralism, the House of Peoples’ Representatives has issued the Federal Courts of Sharia Consolidation Proclamation.\textsuperscript{40} Article 4(1) of this Proclamation stipulates that:

\textit{Federal Courts of Sharia shall have common jurisdiction over the following matters:
  a) any question regarding marriage, divorce, maintenance, guardianship of minors and family relationships; provided that the marriage to which the question relates was concluded or the parties have consented to be adjudicated in accordance with Islamic law;
  b) any question regarding Wakf, gift/Hiba/, succession of wills, provided that the endower or donor is a Muslim or the deceased was a Muslim at the time of his death;
  c) any question regarding payment of costs incurred in any suit relating to the aforementioned matters.}

Sub-article 2 of the same proclamation reiterates the principle of parties consent as the basis for the adjudicatory similar to the provision of article 34(5) of the FDRE Constitution. From this, we can understand that Sharia \textsuperscript{40}Federal Courts of Sharia Consolidation Proc. No.188 /1999,\textit{supra} note 5.

Courts can assume jurisdiction only where the parties have expressly consented to be adjudicated under Islamic law. As it is understood from article 4(1) (a) and (2) of the same proclamation, Sharia Courts have a jurisdiction in two ways. Namely, when the marriage is concluded according to Islamic law, and when the parties have expressly consented to be adjudicated under Islamic law. The FDRE Constitution and the Sharia Court Consolidation Proclamation attached, to the exercise of the jurisdiction, the demonstration of express consent by the parties as a condition. In this regard, the same proclamation provides under art. 5(1) & (2) how consent of the parties is expressly demonstrated.

Accordingly, parties who file a case as a plaintiff can be presumed to have shown his/her consent to the jurisdiction of the court. As to the establishment of defendant’s consent, the proclamation provides that along with the notice to be served on the defendant, a form shall be attached in which the defendant declares that he/she expressly consents to the hearing of the case by Sharia Courts. It is also possible that the defendant may not fill in the declaration but appear during the opening of the hearing of a suit and raise his/her preliminary objection orally against the exercise of jurisdiction by a Sharia Court. Tacit consent is also recognized under this article as instance that shows the expression of party’s consents. It is a situation where the parties that are duly summoned failed to appear. In such situation, the Sharia Court proceeds to hear a case, ex parte.

Once the declaration of consents are shown by parties to the adjudication of court, under no circumstance a case brought before a court of Sharia be transferred to a regular court; nor a case before a regular court be transferred to a Court of Sharia as it is mentioned under sub- article 4 of the same Article. Hence, according to the author, it is the waiver of the right of party (to be adjudicated by regular court) who consent to the jurisdiction of Sharia Court.

Legal pluralism makes it inevitable that there are multiplicities of legal orders where there are interactions and overlapping between the multiple Thus, legal pluralism opens room for the potential difference between customary and religious laws and state laws. A case in point relates to matters that are to be resolved by Islamic law, which has normative and conceptual differences with state laws regarding the rights of women during inheritance.

 Sharia courts apply substantive sharia law (succession law) that follows different approaches from state laws regarding issues related with women succession. Under Islamic law of succession, women are allowed to inherit half of men, and this is totally different from the FDRE Constitution and internationally ratified treaties standard that provide absolute equality of share for men and women. This difference raises a question that needs an answer. How can this be reconciled with the issue of supremacy clause under article 9 of the FDRE Constitution? This article states that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land. It also states that “any law, customary practice, and act of an agency of government or official act that contravenes the Constitution is invalid”. In this article, the phrase “any law” is used to cover all laws, which are now in force both at the federal and regional levels. Islamic law that is applied in Sharia Court becomes one aspect of state law because of the recognition it is endowed with by the Constitution. This factor makes it to fall under the phrase “any law” that covers all laws, which are now in force including Islamic law in Sharia Court.

The answer to the above question can be answered in two ways. The first one is - based on pro-supremacy clause of the Constitution and human rights treaties ratified by the country. The support for this line of answer is found in the provisions of the Constitution itself. The Constitution contains a supremacy clause that provides that any law, decision of state organ or official and customary practices that are contrary to the spirit of the Constitution shall be of no effect. Hence, if decisions of Islamic Succession laws are in contradiction with constitutional provisions, they shall be of no

42For example, Art. 35(7) of the FDRE Constitution stipulates: “Women have the right to acquire, administer, control, use and transfer property. In particular, they have equal rights with men with respect to use, transfer, administration and control of land. They shall also enjoy equal treatment in the inheritance of property.”
43FDRE Constitution, Art.9 (1).
effect. This means that any decision by Islamic succession law through application of this law by Sharia court should be compatible with the supremacy clause of the Constitution and other provisions of the Constitution relating to fundamental rights, including the rights of women during succession.\textsuperscript{44}

The second one is –based on the assertion that the decisions of Sharia Courts should rather be treated as an exception to the supremacy clause and treaties ratified by the country. The Constitution recognizes the settlement of disputes related to personal matters by customary and religious bodies so long as parties refer a matter to such institution through their own consent. This implies that the Constitution acknowledges the difference between state law and customary and religious laws; and also tolerates their decision in matters affecting personal status of individuals. This is to mean recognition for the application of customary and religious law in area of personal matter when the parties are voluntarily consented to such organ under the principle of legal pluralism presupposes the willingness to admit decision in conflict with the constitutional standard that is rendered by such institutions. Hence, it can be argued that the supremacy clause of the Constitution does not apply to decisions of Islamic Succession Law that is applied by Sharia courts even if the substantive decisions made by this law are in conflict with the standard under the Constitution.\textsuperscript{45}

The author prefers the second line of argument, because subjecting the decision of Islamic Succession Law to the supremacy clause of the Constitution goes against the very essence of legal pluralism acknowledged by the Constitution itself provided that parties to a dispute voluntarily consent to take their case to a Sharia Court. This is to mean the first line of argument may, in the final analysis, bring about denial of recognition to religious and customary laws that contradicts with the Constitution, which is against the principle of legal pluralism. At the end of the day, it may bring about the substitution of religious and customary laws by the state laws.

\textsuperscript{45} Ibid.
5. THE REASON WHY WOMEN INHERIT HALF OF MEN’S SHARE UNDER ISLAMIC LAW

Regarding the question why men are getting double share of women, there are many reasons or justifications that are provided by Muslim scholars. This section deals with some of these reasons.

5.1. FINANCIAL RESPONSIBILITY/BURDEN BORN BY MEN

In Islam, it is the husband who marries the women and undertakes to maintain her and their children; he bears the responsibility of the whole structure of the family.\(^{46}\) It is also his duty to contribute financially to all good causes in his society.\(^{47}\) All financial burdens are born by him alone.\(^{48}\)

The reason why a man is made responsible for his household is due to financial and moral responsibility of the household which requires a strong personality, precision, and decisiveness in decision-making. For this reason, the responsibility of managing, directing, and running the household affair is imposed on men, not on women. This is for the fact that physical and mental makeup of men qualifies them to take charge of this responsibility.\(^{49}\) This responsibility does not show supremacy or preference of the husband in any way, rather it is the imposition of duty or obligation that results from his physical strength and sturdy. In other words, women are free from carrying household financial responsibility. In Islam, they are not legally required to provide for any person, including themselves. If they have no independent resource, they are fully maintained by their able male relatives. Even the wealthy wife is maintained by the husband, the needy sister by her brother, the mother by the son, and the daughter by the father.\(^{50}\)

The reason why women are exempted from carrying household financial responsibility is due to their inability to carry out such responsibility in the same manner with men. However, this does not mean that women are unable to carry out every duty as a whole. Due to many things that happen to them physically and take place in their life such as bearing children, delivery, nursing, child care and custody, etc, they are not qualified as men to take charge of this responsibility.\textsuperscript{51} For example, during pregnancy, they are more fatigue and a slight effort will negatively affect them; they are more concerned with the fetus than themselves; they worry about their delivery whether it is going to be normal or not; and they concern much with the welfare of the child whether it will be normal, healthy or otherwise.\textsuperscript{52} Women require confinement period for rest after delivery for a period that varies from women to women. All these facts affect the mentality of women, and are reflected in their life, attitude, and behavior which make them unqualified to hold financial responsibility. Moreover, the muscles of men are naturally more powerful than women. This fact enables them to perform tedious, tiring, laborious, and manual jobs than women. Thus, they are naturally equipped to take financial responsibility of their household.\textsuperscript{53}

Unlike Islamic law, state laws oblige women to contribute to the household expenses in proportion to their earning.\textsuperscript{54} As it can be inferred from this provision, women under state laws are expected to bear similar responsibility with men. That is why they are entitled to inherit equal to men when the issue of succession arises.

Indeed, when women get less than a man does, she is not actually deprived of anything that she has worked for. It is something coming to her from another source as additional or extra. It is something that neither a man nor a woman struggled for. It is a sort of aid, and any aid has to be distributed according to the urgent needs and responsibility they have.\textsuperscript{55} As it is mentioned here in above, women under Islam are not bound to contribute to their household expense including any expense on themselves since it is covered by men relatives. Thus, according to the author, from the legal point of view, it would have been injustice if a woman who has not bound to contribute anything in the way of earning toward the family got an equal share with men.

5.2. NON-EXISTENCE OF COMMUNALITY OF PROPERTY BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE

In Islam, whatever property a woman acquired and produced or generated before, during, and after marriage remains her own private property. She has no obligation to spend on her family, including on herself since all her needs is covered by her husband. If she divorced, she has the right to retake back all what she has already acquired or possessed as personal property with all income she has generated from this personal property together with the alimony she has entitled from her ex-husband. In contrast to this, women under state law are not allowed to retake back all of income she has generated by her personal effort and from her personal property after marriage for it is considered as common property of the two.

Indeed in Islam, women are given the right to work and be employed. She has permitted to directly conduct her business contact and financial transaction. She has the right to keep this wealth and spend as she wants. She is also not obliged to expend from this wealth even on herself to satisfy some of her need since it is covered by her able male relatives as it is said earlier. She is not forbidden from seeking employment and there is no ban on benefiting from women talent in any field. Whatever she earns from employment becomes her independent income that no one has a share from it. Unlike Islamic, under state laws, the income women’s earn/generated from employment or personal effort after marriage is considered as common property of the two, and it is not her independent income.

Furthermore, in spite of non-existence of communal property between husband and wife, the women in Islam are allowed to dispose their husband

57 Revised Family Code of Ethiopia, Proc. No. 213/2000, Art.62. Sub-article one of this provision states that “All income derived by personal efforts of the spouses and from their common or personal property shall be common property.”

property without his permission and knowledge during the life time of their marriage.\textsuperscript{61} However, this is not possible under state law since they are not allowed to dispose without the consent of their husband even their common property. Under state law, the women are allowed to dispose freely only their personal property.\textsuperscript{62}

5.3. THE LEGAL LIABILITY/OBLIGATION MEN DO CARRY

Under Islam, women are made free from paying any financial penalties/compensation for the wrong they have committed for it is the obligation of their male relative to pay on their behalf.\textsuperscript{63} However, under state laws, everybody is obliged to make good the wrong he/she has committed by himself/herself except where he/she is a minor, an insane, etc. in which case the able relatives are liable on his/her behalf.\textsuperscript{64} From this, we can understand that women under state laws are obliged to make good the wrong they have committed by their own unless they are exempted like under vicarious liability.\textsuperscript{65}

According to state laws, if any of the spouses committed a wrong, the compensation is paid out of personal property of such spouses. It is only recovered from common property in the absence of such personal property. This means, in the absence of common property, s/he alone is obliged to pay the said compensation. Also, in case of an unmarried daughter, her family is obliged to pay in her behalf as long as she does not reach the age of majority

(i.e. 18 years). However, under Islamic law, unmarried woman male relatives are obliged to pay on her behalf until she married irrespective of whether she has reached the age of majority.

Another point is, as we have said, women and men are treated differently under Islam. The father if he existed or any other male relatives of women is responsible for her maintenance and any other need until her marriage. This is to mean that her male relatives are responsible to her until she gets married, and if she does not get married until she died whether or not she reached the age of majority. However, under state law, any one- either the parent, or tutor/guardian who entrusted to the proper care of the children are responsible for them only until they have reached the age of majority. On their attainment of this age, they have no legal obligation rather than moral obligation.

5.4. PECUNIARY SUPPLY MADE BY MEN DURING THE MARRIAGE

A woman under Islam is given dowry by her husband during her marriage. It is made a condition for a marriage contract to be valid. Dowry is exclusive right of women. It is a legal financial right that nobody can violate. This dowry continues to be her personal property after marriage. Under state law, we cannot find the idea of dowry which can be given to women by husband as a condition for the validity of marriage.

5.5. THE FAVOUR MADE TO WOMEN DURING SUCCESSION ON THE NUMBER OF HEIR CALLED TO SUCCESSION

Under state law, up on the death of the deceased, the first degree relatives of the deceased who are called to succession are his/her children. It is only on the non-existence of his/her children that the next degree relatives are called to succession. What we understand from this rule is that women that can be called to succession of the deceased on the first degree are only his daughters irrespective of their number.\textsuperscript{69} However, under Islam, there are first twelve degree heirs that are called to succession at one time. This is due to the wider distribution of property in smaller share or for the purpose of breaking up concentration of wealth among a few hands thereby ensuring the socio-economic welfare of a society at large. Out of these twelve primary heirs, the female inheritors are eight in number.\textsuperscript{70} Here one may guess the situation in which the total amount of share inherited by these women becomes proportional with total amount inherited by the remaining men jointly even if it differs at individual level.

Another point is, remember what has been said in connection with a husband and a wife inheriting each other under Islam. The author has said that the wife inherits one eighth (1/8) of her husband property if he died while the husband inherit half of his wife property if she died (this is in a situation where they have survived by a children) and also we have said that the wife inherit one fourth (1/4) of her husband property if he died while the husband inherit half of his wife property if she died (this is in a situation where they have not survived by the children). In addition to the reason we have mentioned above, the full implication of this idea must be seen in light of the fact that the husband and wife hold their properties and possession independently of each other. This is to mean that there is no mandatory communality of property between husband and wife in Islam as we have mentioned above.

Thus, it is an interestingly verifiable proportion that the Muslim husband usually owns more than his wife and therefore he is likely to leave more behind than she should. For example, if he survives her, which is less likely from a demographic standpoints, his arithmetically larger share of inheritance – the one half of her independently held and owned property – may in fact be equal to or even less than her arithmetically smaller share, the one-fourth of his independently held and owned property.\textsuperscript{71} This is assuming that there are no children involved; otherwise, his one-half becomes one-fourth and her one fourth an eighth.\textsuperscript{72} Yet the value of a larger share of a

\textsuperscript{70} Abdul RahmanAlsheha, supra note 31,P.25.
\textsuperscript{71} Hammudah Abdal Ati, supra note 28,P.268.
\textsuperscript{72} Ibid.
small estate may be equal to or perhaps even less than the value of a small share of a large estate. Here the end result would seem while the two shares are arithmetically different, they are not necessarily unequal in the final result.\textsuperscript{73}

In general, based on the above reasons, demanding a fair, just, or equal share between Muslim men and women who do not carry equal financial obligation or responsibility becomes unfair and unjust demand as to the author.

If the women share in inheritance and her financial responsibility is juxtaposed, one can realize that Islamic law is more favorable to women than men since it allows women to inherit without imposing any financial obligation to spend for anything even for themselves. In short, the financial status of women, if maintenance right, inheritance right and right of marital gift are added together, the Muslim women are far in a better position than men. Here, one may say putting the women on a better position than men contradict with the principle of equality/fairness by itself. However, this has its own reason and justification that the author reserves it to be discussed under independent work.

As opposed to Islamic law, men and women are equally responsible under state law to contribute to their household expense in proportion to their earning. They are also equally obliged to carry inside home and outside home responsibility to serve their family even though the inside home responsibility is left to the women in reality.\textsuperscript{74} This dual responsibility at inside home and outside home is the misuse of women in Ethiopia. This is strenuous and irksome for women to work both at inside home and outside home while men are working only at the outside home but carrying equal responsibility of household with women. This is far different from women under Islam who relieved free from the outside home responsibility/activity (this is not to mean that they are prohibited from working outside home, and whatever they work in outside home, it is their personal) at the same time

6. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

Now, internationally ratified treaties recognized absolute equality between men and women. Similarly, the state laws also recognize absolute equality between men and women. As per these laws, one of the mechanisms by which the equality of men and women are recognized is through the enjoyment of equal share during succession. Different internationally ratified treaty and state laws are clearly and expressly recognized absolute equality of share between men and women.

However, Islamic law has a different approach towards the share of women during succession. Under Islamic law, women have no equal share with men in principle although this is not without exceptions. Hence, according to the author, it is better if the share given to women under Islamic Succession Law is considered from the perspectives of the reason that justifies it and legal pluralism that accommodates overlapping laws (as recognized by the FDRE Constitution), but not from the perspective of share of women under state laws. Also, decisions rendered by Sharia Courts (that apply Islamic Succession Law) should not be expected to meet absolute equality standard state laws as long as parties are voluntarily consented to be adjudicated by Sharia Court.

The negative attitude against Sharia succession law can be addressed by raising the awareness of people, especially women’s. In this regard, the state is required to encourage and facilitate forum for discussion and awareness creation. Also, different Medias either governmental or private one can play vital roles. Furthermore, it is better if the government makes Islamic law related with personal matter to be delivered in the universities as separate and independent course in addition to Sharia law/course that is rendered in a general way. Because, this may help law students to raise and discuss the existing controversies in the area thereby increasing awareness and understanding on Islamic law in general and its succession law in particular. Even this may help law graduates to become a judge in Sharia Courts as one of the institution that endowed with judicial power.
LAND GOVERNANCE IN ETHIOPIA: TOWARDS EVALUATING GLOBAL TRENDS

ABSTRACT

Land is a vital resource and a driver of economic growth and development. The way it is governed and administered therefore has a significant impact on a certain country’s future. Land and the institutions that govern its ownership and use greatly affect economic growth and contributes in poverty reduction. Lack of access to land and inefficient or corrupt systems of land administration have a negative impact on a country’s investment, climate and general wellbeing of the society. Well-functioning land institutions, land markets and easy access to credit facilities for entrepreneurs contribute for development.

Land governance must help to eradicate poverty, not contribute to it. Hence, Ethiopia needs to have a land governance policy that fosters transfer of land rights, fosters respect for human rights, and rescues the environment from imminent peril in line with the principles of sustainable development. Hence, this article contributes knowledge towards responsible land governance and evaluated the Ethiopian lands regime in line with the accepted norms of land governance. Thus, the method of analysis is doctrinal legal research.

1. INTRODUCTION TO LAND GOVERNANCE AND DEVELOPMENT

1.1. BACKGROUND OVERVIEW

Land is a vital resource and a driver of economic growth and development.¹ Land is one of the greatest resources in most countries. People require land and related resources such as forests and water for the production of food and to sustain basic livelihoods. Land provides a place for housing and cities, and is a basic factor of production as well as a basis for social, cultural and religious values and practices. Access to land and other natural resources and the associated security of tenure have significant implications for development and security. Nonetheless, the land rights of the poor and vulnerable are increasingly affected by climate change, violent conflicts and natural disasters, population growth and urbanization, and demands for new energy sources such as bio-fuels.²

While some progress has been made in improving secure access to land and other natural resources for the rural and urban poor, a number of longstanding challenges remain. Although ancestral rights to land and other natural resources are a cornerstone of the livelihoods of indigenous people, the legal recognition and safeguarding of such rights has been uneven.

The paper argues that the quality of land governance is an important determinant of the number and scale of tenure-related problems. The quality of land governance, moreover, will also affect the outcome of reforms designed to address these same problems. Weak land governance has adverse consequences for society. It is found in formal statutory land governance as well as in informal and customary tenure arrangements. The poor are particularly vulnerable to the effects of weak governance as they lack the ability to protect their rights to land and other natural resources. In many cities, the poor live under the fear of forced evictions, or more commonly today, development based eviction.³

Weak governance promotes gender inequality as poor women tend to be less able to secure their rights. It fosters social inequality with potentially destabilizing consequences as the rich are able to benefit from opportunities to acquire land and the poor lose their rights to land and common property resources such as grazing lands and forests, jeopardizing community land rights. In addition, weak governance leads to environmental degradation as corrupt public officials and private interests collude to ignore controls on land use, the extraction of water and minerals, and the clearing of forests. The degradation of state land, including national parks, and its illegal appropriation are direct results of weak governance. The evasion of property taxes reduces municipal revenues that could be used to extend infrastructure and provide basic services. The arbitrary application of the rule of law discourages investment and constrains economic development. Weak governance in land tenure tends to flourish where the law is complex, inconsistent or obsolete, where people who work in land agencies lack motivation and are poorly trained and paid, or where decision-making processes are opaque and civil society is weak. Left unaddressed, land-related grievances can degenerate into violence and conflict.

In contrast, good governance of tenure can ensure that rights in land and natural resource are recognized and protected. By doing so, it helps to reduce hunger and poverty, promotes social and economic development and contributes to more sustainable urbanization.\textsuperscript{4} Good governance can contribute to the achievement of a variety of development objectives, including the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals (MDGs), the goals are also aligned to the SDGs.

With respect to MDG1 (Eradicating extreme poverty and hunger) secure access to land and other natural resources is a direct factor in the alleviation of hunger and poverty. Rural landlessness is often the best predictor of hunger and poverty: the poor are usually landless or land-poor. Improved access to land may allow a family to produce food for household consumption, and to increase household income by producing commodities for sale in the market. Secure access to land provides a valuable safety net as a source of shelter, food and income in times of hardship. In cities, security of tenure is a prerequisite for poverty reduction. An estimated 700 million urban poor live in conditions of insecure tenure and an estimated 2 million people are forcibly evicted each year.\textsuperscript{5} Security of tenure for the urban poor promotes investment in homes, neighborhoods and livelihoods, including urban agriculture.

Again MDG3 (promoting gender equality and empower women) need to be considered while talking about land governance. Women often have fewer and weaker rights to land for a variety of reasons including: biases in formal law, in customs, and in the division of labor in society, as well as due to the HIV/AIDS pandemic and the increase in violent conflict and natural disasters that can increase the risk of disinheritance. Land tenure initiatives that promote gender equity can serve to increase women’s power in agricultural production and help secure their inheritance rights. Rights to land are also linked to other access and resource rights, including water, pasture and to timber and non-timber forest products. Secure rights in land can also enhance political voice and participation in decision-making processes.

MDG7 (Ensure environmental sustainability) is also a factor that comes in matters of land governance. Through MDG7, Target 11, Governments commit to having “achieved a significant improvement in the lives of at least 100 million slum dwellers” by 2020. Today there are an estimated 900 million slum dwellers; this figure is projected to increase to 1.4 billion by 2020 and may reach 2 billion by 2030. These figures suggest that even if Target 11 is achieved, it will meet only a small proportion of existing needs and only seven percent of future estimated needs by 2020.\textsuperscript{6} Many informal settlements are located on hazardous land and are at risk from natural disasters and climate change. High land values in urban and pre-urban areas can also create opportunities to use the windfall gains to upgrade informal settlements while minimizing the need for relocation. Ensuring an adequate supply of affordable land is also critical to the prevention of the growth of new slums. Tenure also plays an important role in rural environmental sustainability. By defining access and security of rights to land and its resources, tenure affects how people decide to use the land, and whether they will invest in improvements to the land. Inappropriate tenure policies and inequitable access to land result in over-cultivation and overgrazing of marginal lands. Farmers are more likely to invest in improving their land through soil protection measures, planting trees and improving pastures if they have secure tenure and can thus expect to benefit from their investments over the longer term.

\textsuperscript{5} Ibid.

Improving tenure arrangements and governance can play a substantial role in the achievement of MDG8 (the development of a global partnership for development). This goal includes a commitment to good governance both nationally and internationally under Target 8.A (“Develop further an open, rule-based, predictable, nondiscriminatory trading and financial system”), and the recommendations of this paper are directly relevant to meeting that goal. There is a perceived need for a global partnership to improve coherence among donor approaches and to develop standards for the governance of land tenure. At the country level, the global partnership can also be reflected in strengthened efforts to improve donor coordination in the land sector in line with the Paris Declaration (2005).\textsuperscript{7}

In addition, improved access and tenure security contribute indirectly to other goals. Legally recognized rights in land are often critical to establishing legal identity, which in turn is linked to access to other services such as education (MDG2) and health (MDG5). Secure rights also help ensure that

\textsuperscript{7} Paris Declaration, 2005.
women’s land and property rights are not at risk of disinheritance due to HIV/AIDS (MDG6). Achieving good governance in land is not easy. Policy reforms to strengthen governance require the political will to overcome opposition from those who benefit from non-transparent decision-making and corruption. Improving governance demands the strong commitment of the people involved, and the development of capacity in order to make changes possible. A number of countries around the world have recognized the link between improved land governance, poverty reduction and the achievement of the Millennium Development Goals.\(^8\)

However, in juxtaposition to the MDGs and development plan of Ethiopia, the land regime stands often either in conflict or that it lacks harmony and unity of purpose.

1.2. HIGHLIGHT OF CURRENT LAND GOVERNANCE IN ETHIOPIA

In Ethiopia, all land is under public/state ownership. While land is not subject to sale or other means of exchange, the government does recognize use rights and holdings. The country’s legal and institutional structure with regard to land governance has been criticized for being unnecessarily complicated. The Ministry of Agriculture and Natural Resource is the key responsible organ (under the directorate for land administration and use) towards discharging federal roles in land governance and revisiting existing legislation and so on. The land regime is found in different legislation and again backed by also different customs. The typical feature, therefore, is plurality of laws and institutions. Moreover, Ethiopia’s federal structure gives its regions a lot of autonomy, which, in turn, has led to a coexistence of different laws and institutions with at times unclear responsibilities at different levels.

1.2.1. Matters of Urban Land

Urban land administration is given under the federal constitution to city governments and municipalities. However, there is no common system to administer land in urban areas. Urban land is governed essentially through a lease system, a perpetual permit system and separate legislation for condominiums. While the 2011 Urban Land Lease Holding Proclamation stipulates that the leasehold system will apply to all urban land areas irrespective of how they were acquired, relevant authorities have yet to adopt the leasehold system. This has led to the coexistence of different systems and a high level of informality. In addition, there is no real system to record rights and restrictions, and the registry faces multiple challenges. There is a standard registration fee of ETB 45 per registered property plus an additional stamp duty of 2% of property value.

Nevertheless, as property value estimates are considered to be very low due to the absence of a standard property valuation system, experts argue that there is a significant loss of potential revenue. The urban planning and expansion of Addis Ababa, the capital, is also a contentious issue. This is particularly in the context of urban investments and growth. The World Bank study highlights the encroachment of the city’s master plan in current urban developments. For example, most of the green areas and some of the roads in the master plan have been allocated for private use. Moreover, the city’s expansion also has consequences for the surrounding Oromia region. According to a new iteration of Addis Ababa’s master plan, which has been met with opposition (and later on officially abandoned by the government) by Oromo residents, Oromia would lose an additional 36 towns and cities to Addis Ababa. According to researchers, the city’s expansion in the past has led to forced evictions and displacement of local farming Oromo residents. Protesters feared that seceding Oromo lands to Addis Ababa would lead to more losses in Oromo identity and culture. Thus, urban expansion here and there is being done at the expense of the surrounding farming community without proper compensation plan.

1.2.2. Matters of Rural Land

Rural land administration is afforded to the regions. These take the form of administrative bodies such as, for example, in the regions of Amhara and 9 Belachew, M. and Aytenfisu, Facing the Challenges in Building Sustainable Land Administration Capacity in Ethiopia (FIG Congress, 2010).

Tigray, the “Land Administration and Use Bureau or Authority” or in the region of Oromia, the “Land Administration and Use Bureau. However, unclear responsibilities at different levels of government have led to overlaps. For example, in rural areas, both the land administration institutions and the investment authorities have a mandate to allocate land to investors.

In addition, land registration and certification is also delegated to voluntary, community-elected Land Administration Committees at kebele (village) and woreda (district) level. While these committees have been argued to build community trust in land registration, others point out that these committees are not always provided with sufficient resources. The Ethiopian constitution maintains that all rural residents are entitled to indefinite-term use rights to land. However, the transferability of use rights is primarily restricted to inheritance. Moreover, land laws also mandate that landholders either farm their land or risk losing it through redistribution or expropriation. In other words, rural landholders cannot lease out and stay away from their holdings and pursue nonagricultural livelihood strategies. For example, in the Tigray region, land use right can be lost if the holder leaves the kebele for more than two years.

 Critics of the government-owned land system have argued that the fear of land redistribution have heightened the farmer’s sense of tenure insecurity and undermined investment in productivity. At the same time, critics also argue that it diminishes rural urban mobility as farmers are bound to a life of farming in order to remain landholders.

While land use is free for rural farmers, there are fees collected during rural land registration, namely for certificate costs. However, these are waived for first-time registration in some states. Registration fees range between ETB 5 to ETB 2 depending on the state. While experts have praised Ethiopia’s rapid, pro-poor and gender-sensitive rural land right registration over the past years, issues still remain. For example, only five of the nine regions have actually enacted laws to register rural land holdings. In addition, Ethiopia does not have sufficient land record-keeping systems. This risks undermining

12 World Bank, supra note 4.
the land registration process itself. The tenure insecurity that this causes is argued to lead to informality and hinder rural income diversification.\textsuperscript{13}

2. LAND GOVERNANCE AND THE GLOBAL AGENDA

2.1. MEANING AND ESSENCE OF LAND GOVERNANCE

While the term “land” has a long-established history, the concept of governance emerged in its current form only in the 1980s. While many institutions have developed their own definitions, four specific characteristics of the concept are now generally accepted.\textsuperscript{14} First, governance is conceptually broader than government. An inclusive approach is fundamental because, in many countries, state actors co-exist with their customary, religious and/or informal counterparts. The stakeholders in land thus reflect a broad spectrum of state actors, customary authorities, non-state actors, and the private and professional sectors. Hence, land governance must bring together and network all stakeholders. Governance is more about cooperation than confrontation, and especially in land it is more about cooperation with all stakeholders.

Second, governance emphasizes processes and institutions. Processes define how issues are put on the agenda, how decisions are made and by whom, how those decisions are implemented, and how differences and grievances are managed. The focus on processes also highlights the importance of different ways actors can interact: dialogue, cooperation, conflict, unilateralism, negotiation, compromise, exit, etc. As interaction can change from one mode to another, a governance paradigm also implies dynamic system. From an institutional perspective, governance refers to the rules and the structures that govern and mediate relationships, decision-making and enforcement. As noted above, the rules and structure of land tenure can be formal (e.g. laws, regulations, and bylaws administered by parliaments, courts and municipal councils) as well as informal or customary (e.g. elders councils, social networks, patronage, etc.) or a combination. Hence, the concept of governance fits neatly with this pluralistic institutional framework.

\textsuperscript{13} World Bank, Diagnosing Corruption in Ethiopia: Perceptions, Realities, and the Way Forward for Key Sectors, 2012a.
for land. This is important because the legal system in some countries does not effectively recognize or incorporate customary institutions.

Third, with its emphasis on authority, governance recognizes the importance of politics and power. Politics and power relations have a significant impact on the understanding of a given context or issue, and in developing approaches for reform. Land as a key resource can be manipulated to ebb a factor for ill- governance. Hence, political commitment is needed to use the potential of land for development than exacerbating poverty. Finally, governance is conceptually neutral. The quality of land governance can be good or weak, improving or declining. In order to determine whether governance is effective or weak, one must look at processes as well as outcomes. Thus, what is land governance all about?

2.1.1. Land Governance - A Working Definition

The following working definition for land governance is proposed:

“Land governance concerns the rules, processes and structures through which decisions are made about access to land and its use, the manner in which the decisions are implemented and enforced, the way that competing interests in land are managed.”

Land governance encompasses statutory, customary and religious institutions, as well as informal institutions. It includes state structures such as land agencies, courts, and ministries and municipalities responsible for land. It also includes informal land developers and traditional bodies. It covers the legal and policy framework for land, as well as traditional practices governing land transactions, inheritance and dispute resolution. In short, it includes all relevant institutions from the state, civil society and private sectors.

Land governance is fundamentally about power and the political economy of land. Who benefits from the current legal, institutional and policy framework for land? How does this framework interact with traditional authorities and informal systems? What are the incentive structures for, and what are the constraints on, the diverse land stakeholders? Who has what influence on the way that decisions about land use are made? Who benefits and how? How are the decisions enforced? What recourse exists for managing grievances? The answers to these questions vary from country to country, and from issue to issue within a given country.

2.1.2. Land Governance for Sustainable Development

Arguably sound land governance is the key to achieving sustainable development and to supporting the global agenda of the MDGs (now SDGs). Even in terms of standard indicators such as corruption, land has long been known to be one of the sectors most affected by bad governance, something that is not difficult to understand in light of the fact that land is not only a major asset but also that its values are likely to rise rapidly in many contexts of urbanization and economic development.

Beyond the negative element of reducing opportunity for corruption and bribery, good land governance is also critical as a precondition for sustainable economic development in a number of respects. First, those who have only insecure or short-term land rights are unlikely to invest their full efforts to make long-term improvements attached to the land and may instead be forced to expend significant resources to defend the rights to their land, without producing benefits for the broader economy. Land rights are particularly important for women (especially in case of inheritance or divorce) and for other traditionally disadvantaged groups such as migrants or herders.

Second, secure land tenure facilitates transfer of land at low cost through rentals and sales, improving the allocation of land. Without secure rights, landowners are less willing to rent out their land, something that may impede their ability and willingness to engage in non-agricultural employment or rural-urban migration, reducing the scope for structural change and reducing the productivity of land use in both rural and urban areas.

Third, setting up or expanding a business requires physical space, i.e. land. Nontransparent, corrupt, or simply inefficient systems of land governance constitute a major bottleneck that makes it more costly for small and would-be entrepreneurs to transform good ideas into economically viable enterprises. Also, to the extent that easily transferable land titles can be used as collateral, their availability will reduce the cost of accessing credit, thus increasing opportunities for gainful employment and contributing to innovation and the development of financial systems.

Finally, economic development increases demand for land, and together with public investment in infrastructure and roads, tends to increase land values. But the lack of well-functioning mechanisms to tax land limits the benefit for society, in particular local governments, as much of the gains end up with private individuals and may fuel speculation. If land institutions function properly, land taxation provides a simple, yet efficient, tool to increase effective decentralization and foster local government accountability.

2.2 THE GLOBAL AGENDA IN LAND GOVERNANCE

There is no convention on land at global level yet, there are important guidelines that can be used for nations to improve their land governance system. Among these are the UN Voluntary Land guideline\textsuperscript{16}, the African land declaration\textsuperscript{17} and the recent Africa women land declaration.\textsuperscript{18} These all instruments do not have a binding legal force yet they have more of political persuasive power capable of guiding the actions of governments. At the core of all these instruments is the idea of good land governance, or responsible land governance.

Land governance is about the policies, processes and institutions by which land, property and natural resources are managed. This includes decisions on access to land, land rights, land use, and land development. Land governance is basically about determining and implementing sustainable land policies and establishing a strong relationship between people and land.

Sound land governance is fundamental in achieving sustainable development and poverty reduction and therefore a key component in supporting the global agenda, set by adoption of the MDGs and SDGs. The contribution of \textsuperscript{16}Voluntary Guidelines on the Responsible Governance of Tenure of Land, Fisheries and Forests, 2009. The aim of the guideline is to explicitly strengthen people in developing nations, so that they can secure their livelihood by their own efforts.

\textsuperscript{18}2017, Declaration.
the global community of Land Professionals is vital. Measures for adaptation to climate change will need to be integrated into strategies for poverty reduction to ensure sustainable development. The land management perspective and the role of the operational component of land administration systems therefore need high-level political support and recognition.

The Land Governance for the 21st Century theme focused on adapting and improving our approaches to land governance to be more sensitive to and supportive of these new challenges and to make stakeholders fully aware of the incentives to adopt this paradigm shift. Good land governance must not only control and manage the effective use of physical space, but must also be holistic to ensure sound economic and social outcomes. The World Bank’s land governance assessment framework provides countries with an opportunity to assess and improve their current approaches to meet these global challenges, especially climate change. Land governance must be further democratized by developing tools for all stakeholders to increasingly participate and form partnerships in policy formulation, implementation and monitoring all within more realistic timeframes. The international community must also provide guidance and contract evaluation tools and services to mitigate the risks for countries negotiating international land acquisition contracts – the so called ‘farmlands grab.’

2.2.1. INDICATORS OF GOOD LAND GOVERNANCE

The Land Governance Assessment Framework (LGAF) is intended as a first step to help countries deal with land governance issues. It is a diagnostic tool that is to be implemented at the local level in a collaborative fashion, that addresses the need for guidance to diagnose and benchmark land governance, and that can help countries prioritize reforms and monitor progress over time. The core version of the LGAF comprises a set of detailed indicators to be rated on a scale of precoded statements (from lack of good governance to good practice) based, where possible, on existing information. These indicators are grouped within five broad thematic areas that have been identified as major areas for policy intervention in the land sector:

A) Legal and Institutional Framework: Indicators related to the legal and institutional framework are designed to help policy makers assess (a) the extent to which the range of existing land rights is legally recognized, (b) the level of documentation and enforcement, the cost of enforcing or gradually upgrading these rights, and (c) whether regulation and management of land involve institutions with clear mandates as well as policy processes that are transparent and equitable.

B) Land Use Planning, Management, and Taxation: The intention of this category is to assess whether (a) land use restrictions are justified on the basis of the public interest, (b) necessary exemptions are granted promptly and transparently, (c) the process for land use planning is efficient, and (d) taxes on land and real estate are transparently determined and efficiently collected.

C) Management of Public Land: A focus on public land management aims to help assess the extent to which (a) public landholdings are justified and transparently inventoried and managed; (b) expropriation procedures are applied in the public interest through clear, transparent, and fair processes involving the compensation of all those who lose rights; and (c) the transferor devolution of state land is transparent and monitored.

D) Public Provision of Land Information: Indicators related to this category assess (a) whether land information systems provide sufficient, relevant, and up to-date data on land ownership to the general public and (b) whether land administration services are accessible, affordable, and sustainable.

E) Dispute Resolution and Conflict Management: This fifth set of indicators can be used to assess (a) whether a country has affordable, clearly defined, transparent, and unbiased mechanisms for the resolution of land disputes and (b) whether these mechanisms function effectively in practice.
3. CHALLENGES OF LAND GOVERNANCE IN ETHIOPIA

The challenges of land governance in Ethiopia can be contrasted to the global standards. However, there are a number of elements in Ethiopia’s current land governance system that can create potential entry points for corrupt activities to occur. These include: lack of clear policies, weak institutions, lack of transparency, and limited public participation, and capacity challenges. These points relate to both urban and rural land.

3.1. LACK OF CLEAR LAND POLICIES GEARED TOWARDS DEVELOPMENT

The Ethiopian land governance system is troubled with a high degree of informality. One of the main causes of this is the absence of clear legislation as well as confusion about the applicability of legislation. Indeed, where there is legislation, implementation guidelines are oftentimes lacking, which creates confusion. No single document sets out Ethiopia’s land policy. Moreover, with guidelines or without, the enforcing institutions are weaker.

Instead, laws and policies must be inferred from federal laws, together with laws and directives set by regional and municipal governments. In some cases, there is confusion on the applicability of laws. The country lacks comprehensive land policy. Lack of compressive land policy and strong institutions which help in the implementation of the policy at a federal level has been a major flaw of the land governance regime. The laws lack consistency and coherence because they lack a policy guide which gives general guide to the laws put in place.\(^\text{20}\) Ethiopia’s legal framework comprises its constitution, federal laws (the civil code, the 1997 rural land law as an enacted in 2005 (it is also being revised now, draft level), and the 1993 urban land lease law, revised in 2002, and enacted anew in 2011 and regional laws and directives.\(^\text{21}\) Besides, the customary land governance \(^{21}\)For rural areas, see the Rural Land Administration Proclamation (No. 89/1997) and the Rural Land Administration and Land Use Proclamation (No. 456/2005) issued at the federal level; the Revised Amhara National Regional State Rural Land Administration and Use Proclamation (No. 133/2006); the Regulation for the Implementation of Proclamation 133/2006 (Regulation No. 51/2007); Oromia National Regional State Proclamation (No.

institutions are at large. However, the formal laws stipulate that all land is owned by the government, but use rights of holdings are recognized: private individual; communal, in rural areas; and condominium, in urban areas. Some heterogeneity occurs across regions, which are assigned responsibility for land management and administration by the constitution.

In matters of rural areas, almost all regions had passed implementing legislation or regulations to issue land certificates that recognize individual rights. Thus far, registration and certification of rural private holdings have covered close to 100% percent of rural households in the major four regions. Though individual rights are recognized, their transferability is restricted in a number of ways.

Private holdings cannot be sold or otherwise transferred except through inheritance, which is restricted also to family members. Although rents are allowed, in most regions only part of a holding can be rented out fulfilling many precondition (minimum holding, consent, certification, etc.), and there is also upper limits on the lease period. The constitution maintains that all Ethiopians can get rural land use for free on condition that one is of age and is willing to live on agriculture.

This may significantly limit tenure security. Subdivision below a minimum parcel size of 0.5 ha in rural areas and 2.0 ha in resettlement areas is also 22 However, some regions (Afar, Benishangul-Gumuz, Gambella, Harar, and Somali) lack implementing legislation, making it difficult to formally recognize or enforce peasants’ and pastoralists’ rights. Afar is reported to have issued a rural land administration proclamation recently.

23 Investors can pledge their use rights over the remaining lease period as collateral.

24 For instance, the SNNPRS land administration law (Proclamation No. 110/2007) provides that land rent among peasants can be for a duration of up to 5 years and for investors for a duration of up to 10 years, or rent may extend up to 25 years if the investor is cultivating perennial crops (Article 8). The Oromia Land Administration Law (Proclamation No. 130/2007) provides a duration of up to 3 years if the land is rented out to traditional farmers and up to 15 years for mechanized farming and also limits the land to be rented out to half of a peasant’s landholding (Article 10).
prohibited. Though these restrictions may appear justified from a perspective of equity or productivity, they may in practice contribute little to either or even have perverse effects, and may lead to informality, or may hinder rural income diversification.

The laws are also not clear with regard to communal landholdings because they lack provisions about the nature of those rights and of ways to record or enforce them. The resulting legal vacuum threatens to undermine equity and effective management of common property resources. This hazard is particularly relevant for pastoralists (15 percent of the rural population), whose rights, despite a communal use pattern, appear to be treated as individual ones. Besides, community lands in the highlands are also of prime importance as they are keys in livelihood diversification via providing grazing land. Often community land is not registered yet at times, without a clear definition, ad hoc practices have often been adopted in land certification, with such lands often registered in the name of the kebele (village) government. This practice is not conducive to effective management and may lead to encroachment and poor management of such lands.

In urban areas, the previous and the current Urban Land Lease Holding Proclamation No. 721/2011 (the Lease Proclamation) stipulates that land is allocated through lease system yet regularities are also common feature. The law does not provide criteria to determine as to how the lease system is to operate (via auction, or negotiation or lots). There is also a problem of coexistence of the old permit system (permits granted prior to 1993), under which an annual land rent is paid to the government, and the new lease system (from 1993 onward), which requires payment of the agreed-on lease amount to the relevant government within a period of time to be determined by regions or city government within the lease contract. The Lease Proclamation stipulates that the leasehold system will apply to all urban lands irrespective of how they were acquired. However, the fact that the relevant authorities have to first adopt the leasehold system, something that has rarely happened, leaves ample room for discretion.

25The Lease Proclamation (No. 272/2002, Art. 12/2) states that urban land use may be changed only through a permit granted in writing by the appropriate body. Subsection 3 of the same article provides that the period of a lease for urban land, performance of payments, whereas large towns in Amhara have moved to the lease system, smaller towns have adopted a permit rent system on a virtually permanent basis.

Even under the lease system, payment schedules are excessively complicated, and amounts collected total only a fraction of market values, suggesting that local governments lose large amounts of revenue and the system may not be sustainable.

In contrast to practices for rural land, urban leases or permits are fully transferable except the curtailment introduced in the new lease proclamation of 2011. However, the lease proclamation fails to deal with formalization of informal residential holdings. Rules of adverse possession (long-term peaceful use without legitimate challenge over a period of 15 years) that are still operational under the civil code may provide some legal basis for recognizing squatters’ rights. However, because the code refers to private rights only, its applicability is far from certain. Also, transfer of rights through sale or change of use for commercial purposes will convert the permit into leasehold.

Condominium holdings, which have become widespread in urban areas, are also recognized under Condominium Proclamation No. 370/2003. That document provides clear rules regarding the management of the building, but it lacks clarity regarding the rights to the land beneath the common property.

Apart from condominium holdings, there is no legal recognition of communal holdings such as green areas, forestland, playing fields, and so forth in urban areas, although such holdings exist and are identified in urban plans. Thus, registration of individual holdings in urban areas is lagging rural areas; in 2006, the share of registered housing units was estimated to be 95 percent in Adama (Oromia), 65 percent in Addis Ababa (Oromia), 50 percent in Bahirdar (Amhara), 75 percent in Hawassa (SNNP), and 90 percent in Mekelle (Tigray).

and tax rates are to be changed upon such conversion. This part seems intended to allow the government to capture a share of benefits arising from land use changes.

26 Article 13 of the Lease Proclamation (No. 272/2002) stipulates that any leasehold possessor can transfer or mortgage the right of leasehold.

27 Klaus Deininger et al., The Land Governance Assessment Framework: Identifying and Monitoring Good Practice in the Land Sector (World Bank, 2012)
If one takes into account that a large number of holdings have not yet been formalized, only about 25 percent of the existing individually held urban properties are estimated to be registered in these offices. Between 35 percent and 45 percent of land registered to physical persons is estimated to be registered in the name of women, with variations across regions.

In Amhara, more than 85 percent of certificates name a woman as individual or joint holder, but this share is lower in Oromia and SNNP, where polygamy is more common and holdings are registered in the name of individuals rather than households. Still, there is no doubt that the campaign to register land has significantly improved women’s land rights. The requirement in Amhara and Oromia not only to list females’ names on certificates but also to have their pictures attached appears to have had a very positive effect in this respect.

Though informal settlements account for up to 30 percent of residential holdings in Addis Ababa, no policies or procedures require the systematic regularization of informal holdings. In fact, formalization projects have no basis in federal legislation, and the few sporadic initiatives to formalize existing settlements (in Addis Ababa, Diredawa, and Hawassa) were very costly and of a discretionary nature. Established by ad hoc municipal directives, they lacked transparency and were discontinued without reaching their targets.

3.2. WEAKER INSTITUTIONS

As with legislation and policies, there is a lack of clarity regarding the roles, responsibilities and mandates of institutions. In principle, assignment of responsibilities for policy making and implementation is unambiguous: the federal level formulates policies; regional or municipal governments are responsible for implementation and management of land administration; and the judiciary resolves disputes that might arise in the process. The practice is more complex and could give rise to concerns regarding governance.

Although no single document sets out Ethiopia’s land policy, principles can be inferred from federal laws, together with the laws and directives promulgated by regional and municipal governments. However, the wide delegation of federal mandates to lower levels of government, without sufficient policy guidelines or laws to clearly define the roles of various levels of government, causes ambiguities and vertical overlap. In fact, the mandates on land allocation and administration to the different levels of government within a regional state are usually determined by unpublished administrative directives that often change quickly and without public notice. These practices are not in line with principles of good governance. This problem is mirrored on the side of the judiciary, where unclear mandates of federal first-instance courts, municipal courts, and land clearance and appeals commissions create temptations for forum-shopping and contradictory rulings.

In addition to unclear responsibilities at different levels of government, horizontal overlap is an issue. In rural areas, both the land administration institutions and the investment authorities have a mandate to allocate land to investors. In Addis Ababa, there is lack of clarity regarding the roles of the central administration and the 10 sub-cities in allocating land and administering rights over land.

In one case, this complexity led to allocation of public use areas to construction of housing and commercial buildings. Although the municipal agency responsible for management of parks and green areas in Addis Ababa belatedly identified the trespass of its mandate, no action was taken, because construction had already begun. The fact that the allocating authority felt secure in its mandate to manage the concerned areas, together with the delayed and ineffective response by the agency that was by law responsible for making decisions, illustrate the extent to which mandates are confused and the effect on land governance.

Some institutions have prerogatives for both policy making and implementation, which may lead to conflicts of interest. Three prominent cases are (a) the Ministry of Agriculture, regarding management of forestland and wildlife; (b) the delegation of legislative powers on important policy issues to regional and municipal land administration authorities, in addition to the authorities’ primary policy implementation mandates; and (c) the fact that members of the executive who decide on expropriation may sit with the Clearance Order Appeals Commission that decides appeals in expropriation cases.

28 These lower levels of government that receive mandates are the village (kebele), district (woreda), municipality, zone, and region.

The widespread practice of assigning members of legislative councils and executive committees to serve on land administration committees and lease boards, which have both executive and adjudicatory functions, can also create conflicts of interest. This possibility is not only theoretical; the fact that these committee members sit concurrently on the respective regional or municipal executive councils is reported to have led to the issuance of directives that were specifically targeted to influence the resolution of specific cases.

In addition to the constitutional provision that gives every rural Ethiopian the right to a plot of land, rural land laws explicitly recognize land rights of orphans and women. The corresponding urban land lease laws have provisions making reference to women and persons who have disabilities or who are physically challenged.\(^\text{29}\) However, the equity effect of land policies is not systematically monitored in a way that allows public scrutiny. Although land institutions submit periodic reports, the source and reliability of the underlying data are not always clear. Also, though participatory procedures for lawmaking are enacted and further reinforced by the apparent decentralization of decision making, many laws were developed by experts with little or no public consultation prior to draft laws being forwarded to the legislature. Even in cases of consultation, as in the case of developing the building code, input was by invitation only, something that may exclude many relevant stakeholders such as the academic community and other non–state actors.

3.3. LACK OF TRANSPARENCY AND PUBLIC PARTICIPATION

Another key issue is the lack of transparency and access to information. Lack of transparency is seen to permeate almost all aspects of land administration. For example, some of the policies that govern land administration are determined on the basis of unpublished directives, as mentioned above. This creates a system of uncertainty and lack of clarity for those involved in land administration. Only about 25% of individually held urban properties have been recorded and the records are not reliable or conclusive. About 70% of rural holdings have been registered, but the records are not being kept up to date, which reduces their usefulness. Ethiopian land administration also lacks an inventory of public land systems. Rural areas have no maps of registered holdings and urban areas have limited mapping of registered property. This makes the issuing of forged documents easier.

There is also lack of transparency in the allocation of public land. For example, due to the lack of transparency around tendering for land leaseholds, many people resort to corrupt means to gain land. Moreover, the lack of transparency heightens the insecurity of many land users who are unaware of their rights.

Experts agree that there is limited participation in the land administration process. This affects, for example, the preparation of land use plans. Limited public consultation leads to very limited public awareness of policy and public engagement with policy implementation. Ethiopia’s commercial leasing process to foreign investors has also been criticized for lacking transparency and public participation. It is argued that the leasing process does not adequately consult with stakeholders (including current users of the land) and the terms of the leases are not transparent. As such, there have been some cases large-scale agricultural projects that are not being used as intended. Similarly, it is argued that Addis Ababa’s master plan was developed with little public participation of Oromo people.

3.4. LACK OF CLEAR PROCEDURES FOR UPDATING LAND RECORDS AND REGISTRATION

Rural land certification in Ethiopia’s four main regions is one of the largest and most cost-effective land registration programs worldwide. Over a period of three to five years, the initiative has registered some 25 million parcels. It has been implemented effectively and in a participatory, pro-poor, and gender-sensitive manner. The program significantly departs from the approach of the traditional land titling interventions in a number of ways: (a) by issuing usufruct rights certificates rather than full titles; (b) by promoting gender equity with joint land ownership; (c) by using a participatory, decentralized process of field adjudication; and (d) by using low-cost community identification of boundaries.

All of these helped establish the basis for a low-cost land administration system in rural areas. The cost of registering a property land transfer is low, particularly in rural areas. The only fees collected on rural land registration relate to certificate costs, and even these are waived for first-time registration in Amhara. Rural landholding certificates are issued to landholders for free in Amhara, for ETB 5 in Oromia, and for ETB 2 in SNNP. The direct costs of land registration have been calculated at about ETB 29.5 per household or ETB 8.3 (less than US$1.00) per plot, excluding the cost of the certificate and the annual maintenance cost once the cadastre is established. Registries operate as part of the general administration rather than on a self-sustaining basis.

There is practically no capital investment in the rural land registration system, something that jeopardizes the financial sustainability of the registry.

For sustainability of the gains from first-stage certification in rural areas, land records need to be properly maintained, in particular, those involving the registration of changes. Procedures specify that duplicate registry books be maintained at village (kebele) and district (woreda) levels, but lack of registry books by many kebeles requires travel to the woreda to make changes. The type of books of possession issued to landholders varies widely across regions, with some being parcel based and some being holding based. Agreement on a common computerized system is lacking, and fundamental questions remain unresolved.

No clear procedures exist for updating records, and neither registry books nor landholding certificates are structured in a way that would facilitate recording of changes in rights over time.\textsuperscript{32} There are no clear rules on when \textsuperscript{31} The first stage involves the issuance of textual holding certificates that identify neighbors. They do not include boundary descriptions that are to be provided by cadastral maps, which are to be generated in a second stage.

\textsuperscript{32}For example, landholding certificates in Oromia and SNNP provide no space for updating. Registers used in Amhara, Oromia, and Tigray provide spaces for transfer through inheritance or expropriation. Short-term transfers are not considered in the registers of any region.
and how registers must be updated (for example, inheritance or short-term transfer) or what sanctions may be incurred if that is not done. This lack of requirements suggests that no information is available on recorded (or actual) transactions.

Because none of the regions have developed ways to prepare cadastral maps on a large scale, rural land records lack a spatial reference. Neither private encumbrances nor public restrictions are recorded, and the records in the registry can be searched only by holder name. Although some rural areas have ad hoc standards relating to requirements for services and a time frame for service provision, there is no evidence of their publication. Instead, customers are normally informed of applicable standards at the time of their request. Even where individual rights have been registered, little, if any, of the land held under communal tenure has been mapped and recorded, which reportedly gives rise to significant encroachment.

Given the lack of a formal urban registration system, registration in urban centers is normally linked to the provision of land for new holdings or transfer of ownership for existing holdings. Cadastral plans often identify parcels on A4-size plans prepared in AutoCAD that are printed and appended to the file or, in the case of Addis Ababa, are printed directly on the title certificate.

Though the practice is not consistent, municipalities in major towns mainly keep ledger books (registers) for transfers, mortgages, and title deeds separately. Urban ledger books for title deeds, the nearest thing to a register in some of the urban centers, are stored as files for each property identified by a physical address. Private encumbrances, if registered at all, are thus listed in separate documents, and the fact that registers are held separately from each other without clear cross-referencing makes it difficult for third parties to access them.

The extent of timely access to relevant urban property records varies across urban areas as well as institutions within the same municipality. Although authenticated copies of title deeds and transfer contracts are swiftly provided upon request in Addis Ababa, other municipalities without computerized systems have cumbersome procedures that take significantly more time. Misplacement or even loss of files is also a serious problem in municipalities and semi-urban areas. Available information indicates that service standards exist only for a few aspects related to property registration in urban areas. Even these incomplete standards are rarely published and may change at any time without notice.

In urban areas, information on land rights is available to interested institutions upon written request at no cost. But the absence of relevant information, such as encumbrances over property, makes it very difficult to access land information in practice. Registration fees can be obtained by asking, although they depend on property values. Only intermediaries can obtain copies or extracts of documents, which usually takes more than a month. Mechanisms to handle complaints on land registration include the Office of the Ombudsman at federal and regional levels, as well as complaint committees in most major towns and in rural areas. Because these operate outside the registry system, there is little monitoring of staff in the registry or proactive systems to discourage illegal activity by registry staff.

The costs of adding a title plan to a certificate is about ETB 250. Similarly, the only fees directly related to registration are rather low, at ETB 45 per registered property. In urban areas, an additional stamp duty of 2 percent of property value must be paid. Given widespread under declaration of property values, actual amounts paid are low, contributing to insufficient capital investment in the system.

3.5. LACK OF AN EFFECTIVE DISPUTE RESOLUTION MECHANISM

Disputes over land are common over the world: for example, neighbors disagreeing over boundaries, two parties disputing ownership over a piece of land, conflicts between landlords and tenants, disputes over use rights on common property or collective land, intra-household disputes, inheritance disputes, etc. The critical governance issue regarding disputes, however, is not whether there are disputes, but rather what rules, processes and mechanisms are in place to address grievances, manage disputes and to enforce agreements.

The lack of an effective dispute resolution in the land administration system gives officials a lot of discretion in resolving disputes (World Bank 2012b).
Rules for access to land are not clear and some have better access than others, largely due to relationships or payment of bribes. The private sector usually cannot rely on or wait for the lease or auction process, so it looks to other means.

Despite a system of village-level courts to complement first-instance courts at the woreda, access to justice is difficult. Judges are often ill-informed, because it is difficult to obtain copies of regional legislation for purchase. Courts can be physically distant, especially from pastoral communities and peripheral areas; are often not functional; and may refuse to hear arguments in nonofficial regional languages. Where formal conflict resolution institutions are not functional, as well as in the lowlands, traditional and religious dispute resolution mechanisms have become the most important dispute mechanisms to replace the formal justice system. Decisions of these entities are recognized by the formal system. However, decisions by the traditional elders at the local level may not always be equitable or gender sensitive.

Parallel avenues for conflict resolution also exist, with a number of alternative forums available, including land administration boards, land clearance appeals commissions, municipal courts, regional courts, federal courts, and other institutions with adjudication mandates. There is no mechanism to share information, so collaboration between these institutions is very limited and often informal. As a result, three or four venues may entertain the same case at the same time, especially when one of the parties has the resources. In litigation on land issues, decisions at the first-instance court normally tend to favor the government. Courts are clogged with long-standing land disputes. This backlog is exacerbated by parties lodging parallel actions. It is estimated that land disputes in Ethiopia constitute between one-third and one-half of all cases within the formal justice system.

Overlap also occurs between different conflict resolutions institutions at different administrative levels and in cases of outside investment.
3.6. RESOURCE BASED CHALLENGES

Capacity limitations are also one of the challenges of land governance. In this case, capacity is seen to mean both human resources as well as technical and financial resources.

One of the drivers of corruption has to do with staff funding. Underfunded staff with low motivation that operates in an environment of complicated procedures can have a direct impact on corrupt activities.

In addition, capacity constraints are seen as a major hindrance for the Ethiopian government to carry out its land administration and record land rights. While computerization is being implemented in some level, it is challenged by lack of other infrastructure, such as broadband telecom services. Non-computerized systems have cumbersome procedures that take significantly more time.

In addition, there are issues of misplacement and loss of files. Lastly, financial unsustainability of the land registry is noted as an area of concern. For one, there continues to be limited investment in land administration. In addition, the fees for registering land, both rural and urban are noted to be especially low and not conducive to financial sustainability.

Similarly, lack of clear land valuation system has led to very low rents that do not reflect economic values of properties, which results in local governments forgoing large amounts of potential revenue, which could be used to provide services and infrastructure. While the rural registration process has been commended for positively impacting registration levels among women and the poor, it has also been criticized for allegedly creating an environment of corruption. According to the World Bank study, low fees can provide scope for petty corruption as higher, informal fees become routine in some contexts.
4. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

4.1. CONCLUSIONS

Land is the ultimate resource, for without it life on earth cannot be sustained. Land is both a physical commodity and an abstract concept in that the rights to own or use it are as much a part of the land as the objects rooted in its soil. Good stewardship of the land is essential for present and future generations.

Effective and democratized land governance is at the heart of delivering the global vision of our future laid out in the MDGs. However, the route to this vision is rapidly changing as a series of new environmental, economic and social challenges pervade and impact every aspect of our lives. Land Professionals have a vital role to play and we must understand and respond quickly to this on-going change. Our approaches and solutions across all facets of land governance and associated Land Administration Systems must be continually reviewed and adapted so that we can better manage and mitigate the negative consequences of change. Central to this is our response to climate change, food security and poverty alleviation.

There are guidelines, frameworks, and principles adopted and recommended by the UN, AU and EU, which could all serve as a reference point for rethinking the reform efforts in Ethiopia. However, it is to be noted that there are no binding legal documents on land governance both at the international and the African level. In the absence of such global binding laws or treaties, it is essential to pay attention to the guidelines. The guidelines give considerable flexibility and room for adjustment where there is a political will to reform the land policy.

4.2. RECOMMENDATIONS

Ethiopia lacks a comprehensive and versatile land policy which is detailed with proper legislation reinforced by effective implementing institutions. The 33 Daniel Behailu, supra note 20.

availability of the comprehensive land policy geared towards sustainable development is not only essential but mandatory.\textsuperscript{34}

Policy recommendations for Ethiopia have identified the necessity to provide guidelines for the implementation of federal laws, to have harmonized and realistic restrictions on land rights, to strengthen the legal recognition of women’s rights to rural land, to review participatory process in land policy and legislation, to design federal policies of formalization, to create a federal institution for land valuation, to consistently consider land values when land is transferred, to establish a complete mapping of land types, to ensure sustainability of the land registration system, and to improve local capacity.\textsuperscript{35}

A) Policy and Institutional Guidelines: Policies and legislation must recognize the many facets of land rights and usage. Above all, poor rural people must be empowered to participate in policy formulation to ensure that their needs and rights are addressed and protected. Although land legislation is the mandate of the federal government, key policy choices have been delegated to regional states. However, detailed guidelines on how federal laws, proclamations, regulations, or directives are to be implemented, and the hierarchy of legislation, are missing. There is no monitoring of implementation, precluding an assessment of the degree of adherence to policies and the reasons for this adherence. An institution to monitor implementation of key laws and regulations in a uniform and consistent manner would be desirable. Define roles and responsibilities of different institutions, including standards for the separation of responsibility for policy formulation, implementation and handling of disputes as well as an agreement on appropriate oversight arrangements.

B) Reasonable Restrictions on Land Rights: In rural areas, some of the restrictions on land use by peasants may be difficult to justify or implement consistently. For example, limiting inheritance to family members actually living on the land may run counter to the land policy’s equity and nondiscrimination objectives and may stymie development of the nonagricultural economy. Constraints on the share of land that can be leased out may similarly limit incentives for investment and nonfarm employment. In fact, despite the existence of land registration, urban residents have, in practice, rights that are more robust than those of their rural counterparts. A review of land transfer restrictions is warranted, with a view to ensuring rural-urban equity in landholding rights, and in light of experience thus far. In urban areas, land use restrictions often are not enforced because laws may be conflicting. Injunctions to protect the possessory rights of persons found in violation of land use legislation are also a serious issue. Though this issue can be sustainably resolved only through a review of the 1960 civil code, its potentially irreversible impact calls for immediate resolution through specific legislation. Such legislation may also consider harmonizing adjudicatory mandates among judicial bodies at the federal, regional, and municipal levels.

\textsuperscript{35}Klaus Deininger et al., supra note 27.

C) Appreciation of Women’s Rights to Rural Land: Though the rights of women to have access to land on equal footing with men have been explicitly stated in the relevant federal and regional laws, and major strides to secure these rights have been made through rural land certification, two gaps remain. One is that laws in Oromia and SNNP do not clearly address the rights of women in polygamous unions. A second gap is that laws promoting female equality are limited to agrarian contexts, and guidelines are lacking for women’s rights in the context of communal landholdings in pastoral areas. A review of rural land use legislation at all levels is recommended to clarify the status of the women’s land use rights, together with follow-up actions to encourage effective exercise of these rights (for example, through female participation on land certification committees).

D) Participatory Decision Making on Land Issues: Carry out comprehensive public awareness campaigns, including systems to capture public feedback. Though highly desirable, decentralization in the design and implementation of land policy, legislation, and land use planning has not led to the expected levels of public participation. Thus, a review of the decision-making processes relating to land issues in light of federal policy on local government and decentralization will be useful. This effort should include a review of the extent to which equity and nondiscrimination in land policy and legislation can be mainstreamed and integrated into existing policy frameworks. It can be combined with an assessment of the results of the implementation of rural land policy thus far and the suggestion of monitoring indicators for the future.

E) Formalization in Urban Areas and Prevention of Informality in Rural Areas: Informality, through squatting and non-formalized holding rights, is a problem of increasing importance for land use and policy in Addis Ababa and other towns. Yet, efforts to address the problem have been limited and piecemeal, often in the context of ad hoc measures that lacked clarity and uniformity. Given the size of the problem, it would be more appropriate to address the issue through policy decisions at the federal level. Informal settlement by peasants in forestland or other public land is also likely to become a serious challenge to rural land use, and policy measures to address the problem at an early stage are needed, preferably at the federal level.

F) Property Valuation Institution: Gaps and problems in property valuation are widespread. A contributing factor is the absence of a uniform system of land valuation in line with Ethiopia’s land tenure system. This uniformity can best be achieved by creating a specialized institution to set guidelines for land and property valuation in urban and rural areas. Such an institution would be most effective if supported by legislative provisions at the federal level. Moreover, to the extent that the current infrastructure-based valuation system is to be maintained in urban areas, the outdated studies used as the basis for valuation need to be updated.

G) Transfers to Take into Account Land Value Consistently: A key factor underlying the discrepancies between the land rent and taxation systems and the market is the fact that land value is not taken into account in assessing the value of properties. Though apparently consistent with public policy considerations, the current system is unrealistic. Such deficiencies are particularly serious for compensation and relocation assistance in cases of clearance and expropriation. Mechanisms to base these cases on market values are a priority. Also, although laws provide for compensation for clearance of land in rural areas, current practice has led to uncompensated clearance of peasants in some areas because of a failure to clearly identify the party responsible for payment of compensation. Analysis of the gaps is recommended, with identification of immediate measures to protect peasants having to clear their landholdings for urban expansion.

H) Complete Mapping of Publicly, Privately and Communally Held Land: Although land certification had very positive effects in terms of perceived tenure security and female empowerment, incomplete registers and maps reduce its effectiveness. Efforts to put in place cadastres in urban areas are encouraging, but they should be comprehensive (covering state, private, and communal land) and clearly linked to land rights. Also, because many problems with the current land use planning and policy framework can be traced in part to absence of comprehensive and up-to-date land use information, prompt compilation of such information (including up-to-date benchmarks for valuation) is needed. Finally, there is need to ensure that institutions using land-related information share databases to avoid duplication of effort and confusion. In land dispute adjudication, absence of a mechanism to share information led to extensive forum shopping and parallel processes. Establishment of a networking system such as the one between police, prosecution, and courts in criminal cases is recommended.

I) Sustainability of the Rural Land Registration System: Ensuring the sustainability of rural land registration requires at least a minimum level of investment in equipment and human resources for maintenance. Such investment will need to be linked to monitoring of registry performance and establishment of financing arrangements (for example, clear user fees and possibly some cross-subsidies from urban areas) to ensure sustainability of the registration system at federal, regional, and local levels. Federal standards can greatly reduce the cost of such maintenance.

J) Strengthening of Local Governance: A very positive aspect of the current land administration system is its high level of decentralization.
However, though authority for most decisions rests at the local level, guidance to inform officials at woreda and village levels is lacking. Defining local governance structures, roles, and mandates in land governance should be considered. Because limited capacity of local implementing structures at the local level is a pervasive problem, building the capacities of these structures should continue to be a policy priority. Capacity-building efforts should also be considered by putting in place the necessary federal and regional laws, regulations, and guidelines as well as making technical support available.
